But I am admonished that I must conclude. I have dwelt at length only upon a portion of the extravagance of this Government, and chiefly upon that part which belongs to the reconstruction policy of the Republican party. I have not time to discuss its profligacy in other directions; nor have I dwelt upon the smaller matters, such as the profuse expenditures out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House; as, for example, the pay of a crowd of useless clerks, the expenses of partisan investigating committees, and especially the expenses of the impeachment proceedings through all their costly stages of injustice and failure.

I have not even noticed that unwise and unjust legislation by which Congress has created an aristocracy of Government bondholders, by exempting from taxation their investments, amounting to more than one fifth of the entire capital of the country. All these and other unwise, unjust, and extravagant acts of legislation have assisted to reduce the nation to its present condition of almost hopeless indebtedness, discredit, and oppressive and unequal taxation.

Issues of the Campaign.

SPEECH OF HON. AUSTIN BLAIR, OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BLAIR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: We are about to return to the people and to submit our work to their final judgment. To this it always comes at last. It is a healthful process both for Representative and constituent. It tends to cleanse the political atmosphere, removes doubts, spreads information, silences clamors, and finally settles every thing. Political creeds are brought to the test of discussion, political charlatanism exposed, and the truth vindicated. Parties are tried and judgment is pronounced upon their pretensions by the tribunal from which there is no appeal.

The ballot-box is the only infallible test of truth in our system of free representative government, and whoever shall refuse to obey its decision is neither a patriotic citizen nor a trustworthy man. There has been but one notable instance in the history of the country in which such a refusal has been made, and the result of that appeal is not such as to encourage future attempts. If there are any now who threaten to renew that experiment I believe they will find occasion to reconsider the determination before it is entered upon. The very healthful character of an appeal to the people was well illustrated two years ago. Before that election we heard very much, as indeed we do now, of the usurpations of Congress and its gross tyranny over the rebel States.

It was said by the President that it was "a pretended Congress hanging on the verge of the Government," and the people were significantly told that the remedy rested with themselves. That remedy they applied so effectually as to awe into silence and acquiescence for the time being even that turbulent disturber. Let us not doubt that the decision of next November will be equally wise and patriotic, and its effect equally conclusive and pacifying.

The Republican party, sir, enters upon this campaign joyfully. It at least has nothing to fear, but everything to hope from it. Between it and the people there has been full confidence and accord from the beginning. Ever since its organization in 1856 it has remained faithful to the principles of republican liberty upon which it was then founded, when it resolved—

"That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions, and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the Union of the States shall be preserved."

Standing upon this platform it fought through its first great national battle, and though its candidate did not reach the Presidency yet it triumphed in twelve States, and proved that its platform was of solid timber and its forces equal to victory in the next succeeding trial.

Confident, but obedient to the verdict of the people, the Republicans bided their time. Amid fierce denunciations and threats of dissolution and war they met again at Chicago, in May, 1860, to nominate candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency and to prepare for the great struggle which every one saw must result in victory. They repeated their resolve of 1856, as follows:

"Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions, and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the State, and the Union of the States must and shall be preserved."

Thus, having reaffirmed its cherished principles, and inviting the coöperation of all citizens agreeing substantially with them, they nominated Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin for President and Vice President, and entered upon the contest as we do now, with assurance of success. The result could not fail. Our enemies were already demoralized, divided, distracted. We were overwhelmingly successful, and the Government passed into Republican hands.

The invincible power of the party consisted wholly in the soundness of its principles and its unwavering fidelity to them. It is preëminently a party of principles. It has never failed to inscribe upon its banners the sacred and time-honored political creed upon which the Government itself is founded. It has fought all its battles "on this line," and has never failed of substantial victory. Since it took possession of the Government in 1861 the Republican party has been tried as no party in this country was ever tried before. It found the Union practically dissolved and eleven States in armed rebellion for the total overthrow of the national Government. Doubt and dismay were everywhere. The Treasury was empty, the Army betrayed, and the Navy scattered abroad.

It is not necessary to repeat the history of the four years that followed. Their record is written on the hearts of the people of this country by the untold agonies they suffered, and all the sophistries of a corrupt and unpatriotic Democracy can never obliterate it. The tall form of our great President, the wise, patriotic statesman and honest man, who guided us through the terrible four years of calamity and war, is still visible to our people. The grand achievements of our armies, which have given us a history, are not forgotten. The great events which have attended the struggle must pass out of men's minds before it will do to charge the Republican party with unfaithfulness either to its principles or to the country.

Let its record be inspected by the people, and then let the decision be pronounced for or against it. What has it done? or rather, what has it not done for the country in the eight years it has held the administration? It found secession bold, defiant, and triumphant, in possession of half the Union, and it has grappled with and crushed it. It encountered a powerful rebellion, organized, consolidated and equipped during a Democratic Administration and without resistance, and it has organized armies, constructed navies, and found the means to supply, equip, and support them, and it has cut in pieces the rebel power with the edge of the sword. In the midst of the great struggle it laid its heavy hand upon that gigantic system of force and fraud which from the foundation of the Government held one half the Union in the grasp of a despotism more blighting and cruel than that of Turkey, while it ruled the other half in its interests through the cohesive power of the public plunder, and it has perished miserably. The infamous pretension that one man may order another; the impious claim that one man may, without offense to the Creator, brutalize another, has gone to its own place, and the political atmosphere is cleared of the stench of its offensiveness forever. The sum of all the villainies, laid bare by the avenging sword of patriotism, is seen at last by the awakened conscience of the nation in all its hideous proportions, and the good and great unite together to bury it out of sight. So great a malefactor never died on any gibbet before.

If the Republican party had no other title to the confidence and gratitude of the country it might safely stand upon this and challenge a comparison with any. Having accomplished these great results it has devoted itself energetically and faithfully to the restoration of the revolted States in accordance with the settled principles of the party which have been deliberately and repeatedly approved by the people. That this restoration has not already been completed in all those States is to be attributed not to us but to our enemies. Steadfastly and resolutely has a Republican Congress pursued its just and righteous policy of reconstruction against obstacles and discouragements of no ordinary character. Embarrassed by judicial stupidity, delayed and hindered by the most stupendous presidential treachery that ever disgraced the annals of politics, the States have nevertheless all been restored to the Union with loyal governments with the exception of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and it is not to be doubted that these will soon follow.

And now the National Republican party of the United States, congratulating the country "upon the assured success of the reconstruction projects of Congress," guarantying equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South, declaring that—

"We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime, and national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors, at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted. That it is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit. That the national debt, contracted as it has been for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period for redemption; and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can possibly be done. That the best policy to diminish our burden of debt is to so improve our credit that capitalists will seek to loan us money at lower rates of interest than we now pay, and must continue to pay so long as repudiation, partial or total, open or covert, is threatened or suspected. That the Government of the United States should be administered with the strictest economy, and the corruptions which have been so shamefully nursed and fostered by Andrew Johnson call loudly for Radical reform!"

comes before the people of the country who have so patriotically and earnestly supported it in all previous trials, and asks the support of their honest ballots.

We meet at the outset in this contest our old adversary, the Democratic party. It is the same enemy with which we have had to contend from the first. We are no strangers to its tactics, and shall not be misled by its false lights. If we speak severely of it it is because it deserves severity. Its very name is a fraud, its platform a delusion, and its pretended reverence for the Constitution and the Union a transparent cheat. Professing confidence "in the intelligence and discriminating justice of the people," it makes its appeals solely to ignorance and vulgar hatreds, and its only hope of success at this time is in exciting the hostility of the different classes and races of our people against each other. No absurdity is too great for it, and no deception too profound for it to undertake. It perverts the language we speak when, with hypocritical inconsistency, it calls emancipation tyranny and universal suffrage a denial of rights. It was the responsible author of secession, and still remains the unwavering patron of rebellion. I know that gentlemen here feel called upon constantly and indignantly to deny this, but it is nevertheless perfectly true. To prove this conclusively it is only necessary to refer very briefly to the past platforms and history of the party.

The platform of 1856, adopted at Cincinnati, upon which Mr. Buchanan was nominated and elected, contained plainly the whole creed of secession. After denouncing slavery agitation as an unconstitutional interference with the rights of the South, "having a direct tendency to endanger the stability and permanency of the Union," it proceeds to resolve—

"That the Democratic party will faithfully abide by and uphold the principles laid down in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1797 and 1798, and in the report of Mr. Madison to the Virginia Legislature in 1799—that it adopts these principles as containing one of the main foundations of its political creed, and is resolved to carry them out in their obvious meaning and import."

The party here binds itself to those celebrated resolutions of Kentucky and Virginia of 1797 and 1798. I have not those resolutions before me now, but they are familiar I suppose to every member of this House. They are the foundation upon which all the theories of secession have been built. They were not recited in the platform of 1856 at Cincinnati, simply because it was not thought best to recite them in the hearing of the people of the country, but the politicians well understood their import; they affirm substantially that whenever any question arises as to whether the Constitution of the United States has been infringed against the rights of a State, the sole judge of the infringement is the State itself, and that if the State shall so judge, then she is also sole judge of the mode and manner of redress.

Now, sir, I ask if this is not the whole theory of secession; if it does not include the whole body of those vicious ideas upon which for a great many years the party of secession, which finally went into rebellion, was based in the South? If I am not mistaken in this, and I think no candid man will say that I am, it is correct to say that the Democratic party had made itself the party of secession in this country, and that from step to step for many years it had been approaching this result; that it finally affirmed in its platform the doctrine which was made the pretext, if it were not the cause of the secession of the southern States. And as the contest proceeded after the election of 1860, and the choice of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency, and when secession commenced and Mr. Buchanan was still President of the United States, his conduct was in strict accordance with this idea of the platform. When the question was raised as to whether the power of the Union should be used to put down a revolt, that Democratic President said to the country that he found in the Constitution no power to coerce a State. Sir, that was not simply the assertion of Mr. Buchanan. It was the assertion of the principles which lay at the foundation of the platform.

It was the assertion of that upon which he had been chosen and upon which he had accepted the nomination. It was the logical consequence and deduction from the platform itself. He was in strict accord with it. The Republican party was stigmatized throughout the entire contest as an abolition disunion party. We were told all the while during that canvass that if we succeeded it would break up the Union; that interference with the question of slavery was an infringement of the rights of the South. The contest was waged upon that principle; and I repeat that when Mr. Buchanan came finally to make the declaration he did he made it in strict accordance with the platform upon which he stood. Then I say that so far as any principles lay at the bottom of this rebellion it was the Democratic party that was responsible for it. The Republican party was the foe of the movement from the first, and it is so now.

Subsequent to that time the Republican party having taken the Administration of the Government went loyally about the defense of the country in the great emergency in which it was placed. The time for theories had gone by and it was necessary to resort to deeds. Words could no longer settle the question. Finally we stood face to face with the great issue which had been growing upon us for a series of years. It was no longer to be blinked or compromised, but it must be settled. The people of the country had it in their hands. With a foresight which they are apt to possess in cases like this, they had seen that the issue was likely to arrive, and they were prepared for it. They had brought into power a party in whom they had confidence to carry on this contest. They intended no infringement upon the rights of any, but they intended to preserve the country, and to give to their children after them the Government which our fathers had framed for us. It was a patriotic party. It was a party of principles, as I have said before. It had looked this question in the face, and was ready to act upon it. It did act. It took up the question in the spirit with which it was required to be handled. It went on to raise armies to construct and equip navies, and to raise the money to carry on the great war in which it found itself involved. It undertook to meet, to trample under foot, and to crush out forever, both secession and rebellion in this land.

Now, sir, I do not stop here to go over the ground of all this long contest. I only wish to refer to two or three things in connection with it. During this entire contest in which the country was engaged in this struggle for its life, to whom did the people of the country look for success? Upon whom did they rely to carry this contest to a successful issue? Did they look to the Democratic party for it? Did they expect that the party that had made this platform at Cincinnati in 1856, and elected James Buchanan to the Presidency of the United States, would carry the contest to a successful issue? Did they trust it in any instance to the extent of a single musket? Never, sir; from the first they trusted the Republican party alone.

Now, sir, in saying this I am not saying that every Democrat failed his country or was treacherous to his country, for that would be far from the truth. But I am saying, and attempting to maintain, that the party as a party was not loyal to the country, and that it proved it upon every occasion when the question arose.

The country has not forgotten, and it never will be forgotten, how, in the midst of the great struggle, in 1864, when our forces seemed to stand still, when the whole nation was looking on almost breathless, while Sherman was before Atlanta and Grant was marching on Richmond, that this Democratic party met at Chicago, under the presidency of Horatio Seymour, who is now its standard-bearer in this contest, and proclaimed to the country that the war was a failure, and demanded that it should be given up, and that peace should be made "by a convention of the States or other peaceable means." The country had never trusted them in this great struggle, and they proved at that time that it had done right well that it had never trusted them. There is very much beside this which I have not time to repeat. But all along, from the beginning of the war up to that time, when they declared it a failure, the country remembers well how they stigmatized the war; how they sneered at those engaged in it; how they declared that it was an "Abolition war;" how they turned up their aristocratic noses and said it was a "nigger war;" and how some of their chieftains declared they would not fight in such a war and threw up their commissions and laid down their arms. The country has not forgotten and will not forget all these things. I do not need to repeat them. What I have to deal with more particularly here to-night is, the issue that we have to meet at this hour. To-day the two parties are again face to face before the country. The Republican party finds in its place again, as it always has, its old adversary. It renews again the battle of 1856 and the battle of 1860 and the battle of 1864. I warn the people of the country that it is the same party that proclaimed secession in 1856. It is the same party that it was when it blew up at Charleston in 1860. It is the same enemy that it was when it went to Chicago in 1864 and declared the war a failure, and cast contumely and reproach upon every soldier of the Union. It is the same party that bolstered up slavery and opposed emancipation, and that has given its voice and its power, ever since it had any power in this land, in behalf of all oppression as against all liberty.

But I am not in the least afraid that the people of the country will forget this. I know very well that we are assailed with a storm of unmeaning denunciations. They talk to us interminably about usurpations and all that sort of thing. But, sir, we bring them—and they shall hear it over and over again in this contest—back to the old issues where we met them at first. We shall show to the people of the country that we strike the same blows that we struck before; and that they ring on the same anvil upon which we smote them to pieces in our previous contests.

This Democratic party, as it delights to call itself, delighting always to wrest words from their proper legitimate meaning, perverts the very mother tongue that we speak. It calls itself Democratic, while it has long been the chief opponent of all true Democracy in this country.

This party met again lately in national convention in the city of New York. It had in that great city for auditors the "dead rabbits" and the asylum burners they had affiliated with in 1863; fit audience for the men assembled there. And there gathered together the members of both wings of that party. Wade Hampton and his fellow rebels of the Confederate armies, whose hands are yet red with the blood of Union soldiers, came up there and clasped hands with the sympathizers with their cause in the North. This they did for the first time in eight years. For eight long years these sympathizing brethren have been kept apart by the clash of arms, by the roar of artillery, and by the shock of contending armies.

Many times during that long contest we heard the sympathizers with rebellion, like Vallandigham and Horatio Seymour, on this side of the line expressing their sadness that they were not able to reach out their hands and clasp their brethren in the South. They blamed us grievously that they were not able to do so. But their prayers and their petitions the Union soldiers tossed away on the points of their bayonets, while those of the South in real earnest struck them with their bloody swords, and would have none of them. But the time finally arrived when they could meet again lovingly and ardently, as they did recently in New York. On that platform Wade Hampton and John A. McClelland shook hands together. Belmont and the butcher of Fort Pillow embraced each other, and the whole convention went off in loud acclaim over the loving spectacle.

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

Well, sir, not to stop too long upon the character of this convention, composed of the rebels on the one side and their sympathizing friends upon the other; I come now especially to consider the platform which they have submitted to the people of the country. I can hardly blame them that in setting forth this platform they have found it necessary to gloss over a great many things and to talk almost altogether in generalities. They have not said much distinctly and plainly, because it was impossible that they should safely do so. If they had spoken out, as they had done in 1856, the real principle which underlie their organization, it would have destroyed all hope of their success in this contest.

In adopting their platform they have started out with the assertion that the Democratic party puts "its trust in the intelligence and discriminating justice of the people of the United States." I am glad to observe that this is copied from the Buchanan platform of 1856. They put "their trust in the intelligence and discriminating justice of the American people;" they, whose sole hope of success in this contest is in arraying one class of our people against another; in exciting to war and bloodshed one race against another; they, who say to those who do not hold bonds—rob and strike down the bondholder; that they who do not have to pay taxes shall fight against those who do; that they who are white shall make it their principal business to put down and crush those who are not white. Yet they have the hardihood to talk to us of the discriminating justice to which they appeal.

And then they assert that they take their stand upon the Constitution of the United States and they hold it to be the only true foundation and limitation of the powers of the Government of the United States. And this from Wade Hampton, this from Forrest, this from the whole gang of unrepentant rebels at the South! They take their stand upon the Constitution of the United States! Having failed to break it in pieces, having baptized it in the blood of half a million of men in their attempt to destroy it utterly, these men come mouthing before the people of the United States, and tell them that they take their stand upon the Constitution of the United States! Why, sir, could impudence go any further than this! Is it possible to surpass it? I leave any man of sense to judge of the sincerity with which that declaration is made.

And then, sir, their next demand is for the immediate restoration of all the States to all their rights in the Union. Why, sir, these gentlemen are not satisfied to take their stand upon the Constitution of the United States, and to hold it to be "the sole measure of the powers of Government and the limit of those powers," but they are in hot haste to bring back all the States to the enjoyment of all their rights. How long, sir, is it since these gentlemen wished to do that? When was Forrest converted to the Constitution of the United States and to this very ardent affection for the Union, and this earnest desire for the immediate return of Mississippi to all her rights? How long, I ask, is it since they have been affected in this wise? And what hinders them from returning? What hinders the restoration of all these gentlemen to their former rights? Sir, you cannot find it out in this gingerly-drawn platform. If you read this platform all through carefully you shall not know that there has been any rebellion in the United States. No, sir; you cannot find out from the first letter to the last (and there are a great many of them) that there has been any rebellion in the United States. It is said just toward the close of the long stump-speech with which the platform concludes that our soldiers—and this is said very meekly—that our soldiers and sailors ought to be remembered for gaining "a victory over a most determined and gallant foe." Our soldiers and sailors are simply named as "soldiers and sailors;" but the rebels who undertook to destroy them are called "a most determined and gallant foe." Why, does not everybody know that this man, Wade Hampton, was the very pride of that convention in New York?

Their first object, then, as I have said, is to get back into the Union with all their rights; and they are entitled of course to all rights. There having been no rebellion, according to this platform, they are subject to no disabilities; but we are gross tyrants, we of the Republican party, because we do not run after them as the father did after the prodigal son, and, while their hands are yet red, clasp them in our arms and pardon them for all they have done.

Their first request, then, is to come back. Their second is for an "amnesty for all political offenses." "Pardon the men who butchered the prisoners at Fort Pillow," says this Democratic party. Pardon the wretches who made the prison pens at the South and starved to death your loyal Union soldiers, who would die rather than enlist under the rebel flag, and did it by the thousand. What a pity, Mr. Chairman, that we could not dig up out of their graves Booth and Wirz, in order that, when all political offenses are pardoned in the United States, these two special saints of the Democracy might also be pardoned! And then Jefferson Davis, waiting over yonder, hears this sweet and loving call from New York for the pardon of "all political offenses." He shall come back again to sit in the Senate. They have beaten the new constitution, it is said, in Mississippi. They are fighting for the original stamping ground of rebellion and secession. They have got Davis in training for the Senate of the United States. It is fair to say that these Democrats intend to bring him back, to pardon every offense, to strike down the fourteenth amendment, to put laurels on the brow of Davis and seat him again in the high places of the nation. If they do not, then I do not know what means this second claim here. They wish to pardon all political offenses. How will the gallant Union soldiers receive this demand?

Then having disposed of these things, having gotten themselves upon the Constitution, having gotten themselves back handsomely into the Union with pardon of all political offenses, rebels are as good and better than loyal men in the country. Then, Mr. Chairman, they are ready to deal with the public debt. That is the next thing which stands in their way. That they are going to pay as quickly as possible. This is the resolution:

"Third. The payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable, all money drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment, and when the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, that they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States. [Thunders of applause.]"

It was adopted with thunders of applause. What was the occasion of these thunders? The party has been converted to the new dispensation of "lawful money," which it seems is something infinitely to be preferred to actual money. It is a cheap and easy way, they think, of getting rid of a very troublesome subject. In a word, they will pay off the debt in "greenbacks."

Now, sir, I repeat the question which we have been putting to them sincerely and earnestly all along. Gentlemen, when you have paid off the public debt in greenbacks, what do you intend to do with the greenbacks? That is the important question, and to that question your platform furnishes no answer. Will you redeem them in money or will you sweep them out of the way as unconstitutional trash, and thus repudiate the debt altogether? The people have charged you with the latter purpose and you have not denied it. As you were found untrustworthy in the great war out of which the debt grew, we believe you are not to be trusted now with the redemption of it, in which the national honor is concerned. The rebels that came to New York do not mean to pay the debt at all in any form. It was made in subduing them and they hate it.

Their fifth resolution is as follows:

Granted—I find no fault with it—that there shall be the same kind of money for the bondholder, the soldier, the pensioner, and for every citizen. But what kind of money shall that be? Shall it be worthless, useless money for everybody, or shall it be equal to gold and silver? That is the issue between them and us. That is the issue between the Democratic party and the Republican party. The Republican party intends that there shall be the same dollar to pay the debt and for the use of every citizen, and it means it shall be an actual dollar. The Democratic party declares it shall have the same dollar for everybody, but it means it shall be a worthless paper dollar unless I misunderstand it. Then comes taxation. It says taxation shall be made equal, that it shall be lessened, and all that sort of thing; precisely what every one says. It proposes no distinct plan. It does not tell us what it will do. Those who wish to take that promise are at liberty to do it. I will not, and neither will my people. We will try them awhile before we trust them again with the great interests of the country.

Now, sir, this is substantially the platform. As I have said before, there is a long, tedious stump speech at the end of it. That stump speech arraigns the Radical party. It has been arraigning the Republican party ever since that party had a beginning, and it will keep on arraigning it so long as the Democratic party has an existence. We have been arraigned and tried and condemned so constantly that we have got used to it. It does not affect us particularly. In fact, I have the idea that the more this party clamors at us, the more it accuses us of all sorts of usurpation, the better the people like us and the more they vote for us, at least that has been the effect so far. I do not imagine they are about to change. But, sir, after adopting a platform this party nominated for itself candidates, and in order that everything should be in perfect keeping they got a candidate for the Presidency who, if he was particularly noted for anything, it was for having contradicted all the financial theories which the party had put forth in its platform. They had a greenback platform, and so they took a gold-paying candidate. They intend, I suppose, to repeat what they did so beautifully many years ago when in the State of Pennsylvania they preached "Polk and Dallas, and the tariff of 1842." When they come now to the people, as they find men who want to get rid of the payment of the public debt in gold, they will say, "My good fellow, do you want to be rid of your burden of public debt? Look at our platform. There it is. We will pay it off with the printing press." And when they get among the bondholders in the East, August Belmont and the rest of them, and they are asked what they are going to do about these bonds, they will answer, "Look at our candidate; hear what Horatio Seymour says. We had, to be sure, to throw this 'tab to the whale' in our platform, but you know Horatio is a bondholder himself, and likes the ring of the yellow metal in his own pocket. You can trust him, though the platform does seem a little awry on that question."

Compare, now, the magnanimous position of the Republican party on this subject. What it means to do will be found plainly set forth in the platform of the convention at Chicago.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Issues of the Campaign—Mr. Blair.

HO. OF REPS.

It means honest performance of an honorable obligation; it means to keep its promise in the letter and spirit in which it was made. It tells the country that it will go down with its flag flying at the masthead before it will yield a single iota of that which it has proclaimed as the honest duty of the country; it will pay the debt as we agreed to pay it. I think it will be a very pleasant task to meet the people on these platforms and to compare them. Mr. Seymour, as I said, is a very fit nominee for his party. They would gladly have won the soldiers' votes, but they could not nominate a soldier, because their whole record was against the soldiers and they have too many soldier-haters in their ranks. They did not like to nominate a man who was an open copperhead—though Seymour is very nearly that—because there were honest, soldierly Democrats in their ranks who could not vote for such a man. Therefore they made a sort of compromise, and nominated Horatio Seymour, a smooth, plausible gentleman, well informed in public affairs, who makes the promise strong to the ear but breaks it to the hope; a gentleman who is almost always uppermost in the business of his party, and yet who does not commit himself too far; who knows the whole theory of Democratic politics from first to last, a man who has done nothing in particular for his country, and who they hope to make the people believe has done nothing very particular against it.

I shall not detain the House long in commenting upon the Democratic candidate for President, but I will refer to two or three of his sayings during the war, which will show the principles upon which he acted. In January, 1861, he addressed the celebrated Tweddie Hall convention at Albany, and after arguing that we should have to fight a united South, and that therefore success was impossible, he declared that "successful coercion by the North was no less revolutionary than successful secession by the South;" a principle in strict accordance with the platform at Cincinnati, as I have been attempting to show in this discussion. In October, 1861, he declared in a public speech in Merchants' Hall, at Utica, that "if it is true that slavery must be abolished to save the Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from the Government, which cannot give them guarantees by its terms." Here again he maintained the right of secession, for he said "if you cannot maintain the slavery of the South it is your duty to allow the South to withdraw;" and this he said after the war had begun. Again, in 1863 he wrote a letter to the Democratic State committee of Connecticut earnestly urging the election as Governor of that State of Thomas H. Seymour, an undisguised southern sympathizer. He says:

"I feel an intense interest in the result of the election in Connecticut. I have known Thomas H. Seymour from his youth up, and I know that a more patriotic and honest man does not live."

Mr. Thomas H. Seymour was the head and front of the opposition to the war in Connecticut, as the country well knows. On the 16th of May, 1863, he addressed a letter to a Vandalism meeting in Albany, from which I make the following extract:

"Having given it (the Administration) a generous support in the conduct of the war, we now pause to see what sort of a Government it is for which we are asked to pour out our blood and our treasure."

On July 13, 1863, the roughs of New York gave practical force to Governor Seymour's denunciations of the draft, and commenced the terrible riots that are so well remembered. On July 14, Governor Seymour addressed the mob from the City Hall steps, and said:

"My FRIENDS: I have come down here from the quiet of the country to see what was the difficulty; to learn what all this trouble was concerning the draft. Let me assure you that I am your friend. You have been my friends, and now I assure you, my fellow-citizens, that I am here to show you a test of my friendship. I wish to inform you that I have sent my adjutant general to Washington to confer with the authorities there and to have this draft suspended and stopped."

That was the aid he was giving the country in its hour of trial when a draft had been ordered and was about to be put in motion in New York. He had nothing then to say for the country but to make such a speech as that. "My friends," said he to the blood-stained ruffians who had been burning houses in the city, robbing the people, and murdering and burning the innocents there. I add only an extract from the Cooper Institute speech showing his financial views, as follows:

"If we debase the currency by unwise issues of greenbacks we shall equally perplex business and destroy sober industry, and make all prices matters of gambling tricks and chances. This will end as it did in the southern confederacy. At the outset the citizens of Richmond went to market with their money in their vest pockets and brought back their diners in their baskets: in the end they took their money in their baskets, and took home their dinners in their vest pockets."

Nor have I time to stop but a single instant upon the record of the gentleman who was nominated for the Vice Presidency of the United States by that convention. His letter to Mr. Broadhead fixes his position beyond all chance of mistake. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

DEAR COLONEL: In reply to your inquiries I beg leave to say that I leave to you to determine, on consultation with my friends from Missouri, whether my name shall be presented to the Democratic convention, and to submit the following, as what I consider the real and only issue in this contest.

The reconstruction policy of the Radicals will be complete before the next election; the States long excluded will have been admitted; negro suffrage established and the carpet-baggers installed in their seats in both branches of Congress. There is no possibility of changing the political character of the Senate, even if the Democrats should elect their President and a majority of the popular branch of Congress. We cannot, therefore, undo the Radical plan of reconstruction by congressional action; the Senate will continue a bar to its repeal. Must we submit to it? How can it be overthrown? It can only be overthrown by the authority of the Executive who is sworn to maintain the Constitution, and who will fail to do his duty if he allows the Constitution to perish under a series of congressional enactments which are in palpable violation of its fundamental principles.

If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives will control both branches of Congress, and his administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson.

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution. It will not be able to withstand the public judgment, if distinctly invoked and clearly expressed on this fundamental issue, and it is the sure way to avoid all future strife to put the issue plainly to the country.

I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us: shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit. What can a Democratic President do in regard to any of these with a Congress in both branches controlled by the carpet-baggers and their allies? He will be powerless to stop the supplies by which idle negroes are organized into political clubs, by which an army is maintained to protect these vagabonds in their outrages upon the ballot. These, and things like these, eat up the revenues and resources of the Government and destroy its credit—make the difference between gold and greenbacks. We must restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances, and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpation of Congress, known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle.

Your friend,
Colonel JAMES O. BROADHEAD.

It is not the letter, bad as it is, that has so much significance as the act of the convention in nominating General Blair after he had written it. They knew what it contained, and by his nomination after he had written that letter the convention has indorsed the terms of the letter, and stands before the country bound by it as part of its platform. I may add that there are words toward the close of the platform very similar in language to the letter itself. They declare that the reconstruction acts of Congress are usurpations, unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, thus inciting their people to violent resistance of these acts. That is just what General Blair proposes. He is not satisfied with the one war we have had. He is not willing to obey the laws made by the law-making power. He proposes to have a President who shall compel the States that have come into the Union under the laws of Congress to go again out of the Union, and who will drive them out and set up in their places the bastard governments, the slave-holding governments established by Andrew Johnson in the South, or some other sort of government that will suit him better. To elect the Republican candidate, then, is to secure peace in the country. To elect the Democratic candidate is to open the whole contest and to renew the war.

Now, I have but a brief word or two more, and that upon the subject of the candidates which the Republican party has presented before the people of this country. I need not dwell long upon this part of the subject, for those candidates are not unknown to the people of the United States. Admonished by experience great attention was paid to the second office. Andrew Johnson has taught us how fatal an error it is to put into the Vice Presidency a man who has not been thoroughly tried and proved. But for the unparalleled treachery of Johnson reconstruction would have been completed long since and the spectacle of sickening corruptions now seen in public office would have been spared us. The assassination of Mr. Lincoln let loose upon the country such a brood of unclean beasts as was never witnessed before in our country, if it ever was in any other. The people have tried a constitutional remedy in the impeachment, but it has proved illusory, and all must bear with what patience we can this great debauchery until it can be corrected at the elections. In SCHUYLER COLFAX the people will recognize a man long tried in public affairs, of great abilities, unimpeached fidelity, and spotless reputation. We present him as a candidate of eminent qualifications for the office, who has been with us and of us from the formation of the party. He has never betrayed any trust nor failed to meet the full responsibilities of any position he has held. The interests and honor of the country will be safe in his hands.

The candidate we present for the Presidency of the United States is the nominee of the people themselves. The convention at Chicago went there to ratify the nomination; they never made it. Long before the convention assembled the common voice of the loyal people of the country had pointed out who the candidate was to be. They had followed him through four years of agony and blood. They had seen his loyal sword waving at the front of the hosts of the Union in battle, and they had never seen it sheathed before the enemy. They had known him as a man not of many words, but a man of very great deeds. They had seen him tried as no soldier in the country had ever been tried, and they had found him equal to every emergency. They had heard him scoffed at by enemies and doubted by friends. But when the outcome was reached he was always victorious.

There is victory in the very name of Grant. The air rings with it wherever he goes, as it did throughout the long four years' contest. But, say these Democrats, "Oh, he is not so much of a man after all! Very strange and extraordinary circumstances have put him into high position." For once it seems that according to these people lightning got into the habit of striking exactly in the same place all the time for four years, and it flashed brighter and brighter with every clap of thunder that came from the battle-fields of the Union. I said that the people of this country know this man; they know they can trust him; he has proved it on most of the great battle-fields of the war; and he has proved it since. In every position he has ever held he has shown himself steadfast, thorough, honest, and faithful. Modest he is, too, as greatness always is. Grant has never blown his own trumpet on any street in this broad land; that is not his fashion.

A deep thinker, a hard worker, and a harder striker, he has been found equal to the work which was given him to do. And when the people began to look about over this country, and to consider who it was that should complete the great work that the armies of the Union had begun, who it was who should lead them in peace as they had been led in war to victory, who it was who should garner in for them the great crop they had planted, and which was ready for the reaper, the finger of every loyal man in the country pointed out Ulysses S. Grant.

The loyal people of the United States intend to have no more war; they mean that this shall be the end of it. They mean to make sure what the Democratic party says in the beginning of its platform, that secession and slavery have been settled for all time by the events of the last eight years. Ay, indeed, they have been settled, provided the loyal and patriotic party which has settled it thus far can have the control of the country in the settlement of the future. If Ulysses S. Grant is elected to the Presidency, and I believe he will be as confidently as I believe in my existence, all that has been won shall be saved, and nothing lost.

I repeat, the election of our ticket is the final success of the principles established by the war. It is the only fit and consistent closing of the great struggle by a just and peaceful reconstruction.

"Let us have peace;" and to that end let us have Grant.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. T. WILLIAMS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 7, 1868.

On additional articles presented to the House for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Before proceeding to state the reasons which have prompted me to submit the additional charges against the President which have just been read, it is proper, in view of my relation to this House as one of its managers, as well as to my associates themselves, that I should say in advance of what I may have to offer in their support, that what I now do is on my own responsibility alone, though not, of course, without such notice to them as a proper respect for their opinions required me to give. A majority of them did not agree with me as to the wisdom of their exhibition at the present stage of the proceedings. It is not for me to state the reason of their dissent. I may be pardoned, however, for suggesting, in the way of protest only against any different conclusion, that it was not, I think, on the ground that the matters involved were either not impeachable or not true, but rather because they were of the opinion that if the President could not be convicted upon the case already presented against him, it was idle to suppose that there was any possible state of facts on which a conviction could be secured.

I do not concur in this opinion. Although agreeing that the case presented to the Senate, made up as it was of facts that were not open to dispute, was so entirely adequate as to have insured a conviction before any bench of judges learned in the law, it did not strike me as wise to leave the impeachment of the House against so high an officer, with all the power and all the prestige of his place, to rest before a tribunal compounded of such heterogeneous elements, upon any questions of law that afforded so large a scope for the ingenuity of professional men, when there was, I as think, another case in reserve, in which the offense was at least equally heinous, and the facts equally unquestionable, and where the law was so transparent that no false logic could darken counsel, or run away with the understanding of the judge, and no man, whether lawyer or layman, could frame an apology for mistake. If it was important to this nation to convict and remove a President who is admitted even by his apologists in the Senate to be utterly unfit for the high place which he occupies, it was equally important that no material part of his manifold offenses should be overlooked. A careful lawyer who was desirous to convict a great public malefactor, would count, of course, in his indictment on every aspect of his crime. In making up a case, however, against the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, which is a case not for our contemporaries only, but for history, it seemed to me essential, even though the Representatives of the people might convict upon a single head of accusation, that they should give their whole case to the world for the purpose of showing the incorrigible character of the delinquent, and the true magnitude and import of the crimes for which it had become absolutely necessary to the peace and welfare of the State that he should be removed.

In the present aspect of the case, however, it has become apparently an imperative necessity. The trial stands indefinitely adjourned, without an answer to the larger portion of the charges we have preferred. Judging from the vote already given, it is not expected by anybody that you will be able to convict upon them. Can you afford to stop there? With the enormous claims of power asserted on the record, and involved, of course, in the defense, which a verdict of acquittal must and does substantially affirm, are you prepared to accept at the hands of the Senate a result which will not only strip that body itself of its participation in the appointing power, but operate a thorough revolution in the Government by making the minister the master of the laws, without even a last struggle for life, where your means of humbling and deposing a great usurper and criminal, and vindicating your own rights and a violated Constitution, have scarcely yet been drawn upon? Will you be content to sit down and reproach the Senate for allowing him to escape unpunished, until you have at least put its fitness as an impeachment tribunal and its fidelity to the nation, to the last crucial test, by compelling it to pass upon a case which its members now publicly declare themselves compelled to ignore; not only because you have declined to present, but because they mistakenly suppose you to have disaffirmed, if not condoned it yourselves?

So long as the House has the power, as I believe it has, to readjust the balances of the Government by asserting its rightful authority as a branch of the Legislature to make the law and see that it is obeyed in every particular, by calling its ministers to a strict account for every infraction of it, I, for one, will never consent, as a member of it, after so long a struggle with the Executive in the defense of its own just powers, that it shall retire from the contest discomfited and overwhelmed, in the presence of a triumphant usurper, amid the ruins of the Constitution, with—

"Less than half its strength put forth,
And all its thunders in mid-volley checked."

I turn, then, with the permission of the House, to the articles which have just been read, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is no resource still left in this great extremity of the State, to bring a high offender to justice, and to save it from the disaster with which it is menaced in his absolute acquittal.

The first of these articles involves the charge of the usurpation of the just powers of Congress by the assertion of the more than kingly prerogative of erecting governments by proclamation within the rebellious States, under the pretense that it was his right and duty, as the incarnation of the sovereignty of the Union, to execute the constitutional guarantee, upon conditions of his own, and placing over them in the quality of provisional governors, which was an office unknown to the law, creatures of his own appointment, who were disqualified by law for their participation in the rebellion from holding any office whatever under the United States. I will not insult the understanding of the House by inquiring whether this was a usurpation, or whether, under the light of subsequent events, which showed its animus to be to take advantage of the interregnum of Congress, and oust its jurisdiction over the whole question of the readmission of the rebel States, it was not a crime of appalling magnitude. That it was tolerated by the press and people, so long as they were cheated by lying protestations into the belief that it was intended merely to be provisional and experimental, and subject to their will, is not to be denied. It did not deceive me for a moment. I never misunderstood the reasons which had prevented the assemblage of the Congress in that long interregnum, and I came here at the beginning of the next session, as a Representative, prepared to sound the note of alarm to the people; and to arraign the whole proceeding, as I did, at the first opportunity, as a monstrous usurpation, of the most dangerous example, involving a revival of the most odious of the royal prerogatives, in its double aspect of making laws by proclamation, and governing without a Parliament. The facts involved in this charge, except so far as they concern the disability of the appointees, are provable by the record.

The second of these articles charges the payment of salaries to sundry of these unlawful Governors, at rates fixed by the President himself, out of the contingent fund of the War Department in violation of the several statutes of the United States, one prohibiting the payment of money to any person as salary in any office not authorized by some preëxisting law, and the other requiring the previous administration of a test-oath in all cases whatever, as well as in further violation of a public trust, in the misuse of the funds appropriated by law to the contingent expenses of one of the Departments of the Government. It is scarcely necessary to inquire whether this is a misdemeanor, or a grave one. It may not be amiss, however, to suggest that the reason assigned by the Secretary of State for making this unlawful payment out of the funds of the War Department, was that they had no money themselves, to carry out the Executive policy, in the absence of Congress. The facts involved here are also provable by the record.

The third of the charges is the authority given to these officers to seize and appropriate to the payment of the expenses of these unlawful governments the floating property, or as it was denominated by the Secretary of the Treasury, the debris of the rebel confederate and State governments, which had become, of course, the property of the United States, and to eke out any deficiency by taxing the people for the same purpose, in violation not only of that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress alone the power of disposing of the public property, but of that other, and perhaps still more important provision, which vests in the same body only the sovereign power of taxation. It will not be doubted, I suppose, that both these were high-handed usurpations of power which belonged to Congress exclusively. They stand on record evidence like the others. That the authority conferred was actually exercised is a fact confessed by some of these Governors themselves.

The fourth article is upon the surrender to his provisional government in South Carolina, on account of the expenses of its maintenance, of the State works at Greenville, erected by the confederate government for the manufacture of arms on lands donated for that purpose, and valued by appraisement at nearly thirty-four thousand dollars. The case is only distinguishable from the general authority to seize the floating timbers of the wreck of the rebel governments, in the fact that it concerns the realty. It stands also upon record evidence.

The fifth article has relation to the order of the President to the Secretary of the Interior, to issue to his government of North Carolina a large amount of land scrip, under the pretended authority of a law passed during the rebellion, and authorizing the distribution thereof among the States for agricultural purposes. And this was done, as stated, in pursuance of his settled policy to permit each of the rebel States to receive and enjoy all the rights and privileges of any other State in the Union, on the ground that they had been fully restored, and in defiance, of course, of the known will of Congress in the premises. Whether the act of the President in this particular was unwarranted and illegal it is unnecessary to inquire, for the reason that it has been so already solemnly declared in a law of the present Congress expressly prohibiting any further action of that sort, which was approved by the President himself. The charge itself is provable by the record, and the testimony of Mr. Harlan, the then Secretary of the Interior.

The next and sixth point is the surrender, without equivalent, to the stockholders of railroads within the rebel States which were largely employed in carrying on the war against us, of the roads so captured, and on which some forty millions of dollars had been expended by this Government, with all the rolling-stock, of unknown value, belonging thereto, and at least one road, the Piedmont, constructed by the rebel government, and one other, the Nashville and Northwestern, partly built by the United States itself. To estimate the value of all this immense property would be utterly impossible. That it had become, under the law, by reason of its uses and its capture, the property of the United States, is a proposition that cannot be successfully controverted. As such, of course it was, under the Constitution, subject to the disposal of Congress alone. That it could have been made to pay a large part of the debt of the war which its proprietors forced upon this Government, is unquestionable. The facts connected with this monstrous usurpation are provable almost exclusively by the record.

The seventh article of charge refers to the pretended sale of the railroad stock and machinery belonging to the Government in its own right, to the disloyal stockholders of southern railroad companies, upon the order of the President, at a private valuation, upon long terms of credit, and without any security whatever, explained and aggravated as it was by the postponement, after repeated willful defaults, on the part of the purchasers, of the debt due to the Government, which has never yet been paid, for the express purpose of enabling them to satisfy the claims of other creditors, along with arrears of interest on bonds of which the President was himself a large holder at the time. That there was no more power on the part of the President, under the Constitution, to sell this property even at public sale without the authority of Congress than there was to give away any other portion of the property of the United States, is a point that has been already settled by judicial decision. That the colorable sale made here, as well as the gratuitous surrender to the rebel stockholders of all these roads themselves, along with their rolling-stock and equipments, was prompted not only by the desire to strengthen their hands, but to secure the payment of a large and otherwise desperate debt which was owing to himself, is very satisfactorily shown, I think, by his whole conduct in connection therewith. All of the facts involved are provable by the record, with the exception only of the pecuniary interest of the President himself, which is, however, not less provable by other and incontestible evidence.

The eighth article has relation to the surrender to the original rebel proprietors by special order, and under the claim that his pardoning power extended thereto, of an enormous amount of real estate, which had been duly libeled and condemned by judgment of the courts, under the authority of an act of Congress which expressly vested them in the Government of the United States, the President himself insisting, without legal advice and without warrant or color of law, that the proceedings were incomplete, and that the title did not pass without a sale. The value of the property surrendered under this order it is impossible to conjecture. It is sufficient, however, to remark that beside a considerable amount in New Orleans, it embraced about one hundred and twelve plantations or parcels of land in the State of Virginia alone. That it involved another flagrant violation of the Constitution on his part is not to be denied. As matter of fact it stands entirely upon the public records.

The ninth article refers to the surrender by the President of captured and abandoned cotton and other property, that had been seized under the law by the agents of the Treasury, and more particularly to the repayment by him to favored rebel claimants, to the amount of millions of dollars, of the proceeds of actual sales thereof, at his own discretion, and in utter contempt of the act of Congress requiring the same to be paid into the Treasury, and referring the owners for remedy, if aggrieved, to the courts alone. The fact in this case is that the moneys arising from these sources, amounting to some eighteen or twenty millions were endeavored to be kept out of the Treasury by the device of depositing them in the hands of the Treasurer as a sort of special trust fund, in order that they might be drawn upon without warrant of law. Whether the law would not regard them as being where they ought to have been, in the hands of that officer in virtue of his title, as Treasurer, to their custody, and whether the repayment did not therefore involve a violation of the Constitution itself, it is unnecessary to inquire. It is sufficient that the act of Congress was disregarded and defied, as the books of the Treasury and the testimony of Mr. Skinner and the Secretary himself will show.

The tenth article refers to the abuse of the pardoning power, by its exercise on system, and to the great damage of the country, in releasing the most active and formidable of the leaders of the rebellion, and restoring to them their property and means of influence, for the purpose of securing their coöperation in his plan of reconstruction by executive authority, as well as in substantially delegating that power to one or more of his provisional governors, by pledging himself in advance to pardon such persons as might be elected to his conventions, or might be recommended by them. That these things were done on system and for the purpose indicated is provable by the record. Whether the abuse of an admitted power for an illegal object amounts to misconduct in office, and is indictable as such, is not now an open question. That it is a proper subject of impeachment follows as a corollary from this proposition. It was not doubted by Mr. Madison, and cannot be reasonably doubted by anybody. If the law was not so, the grossest and most ruinous acts of maladministration would be without remedy. I do not care, therefore, to waste words upon it.

The eleventh article has relation to the refusal to enforce the laws enacted for the suppression of the rebellion, and the punishment of those who gave it aid and comfort, by directing proceedings against them and their property, and the obstruction of the course of public justice by prohibiting the institution of legal proceedings for that purpose, by staying them indefinitely, or ordering absolutely the discontinuance thereof, and particularly to the case of Clement C. Clay, a State prisoner on parole, whose arrest was forbidden on proceedings instituted against him in the State of Alabama for treason and conspiracy, and whose property, when seized for confiscation under the law of Congress, at the instance of the proper district attorney, was ordered to be restored. It is not disputed, of course, that the President may under the Constitution exercise the pardoning power at his discretion, provided he does it honestly. Mr. Clay stood charged in his own proclamation not only with treason, but with complicity in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, and with organizing bands of robbers, pirates, and murderers in Canada, to burn our cities and ravage our coast. He did not choose to take the responsibility of pardoning him, although he suffered him to go at large on his parole, but he did undertake to interfere with the process of the law, by forbidding his arrest and ordering the restoration of his property, and ultimately removing the attorney whose super-serviceable zeal in behalf of the interests of the nation had rendered him obnoxious to its enemies. That this was a crime against public justice, and a great one, seems to be too clear for controversy. The facts here, too, are provable by the record.

The twelfth article has relation to the failure to prosecute the leader of the rebellion himself, and his surrender after arrest under a proclamation, charging him, among other things, with complicity in the murder of Abraham Lincoln, and offering a reward of $100,000 for his capture, although that complicity had been found by a military commission organized at Washington for the trial of the conspirators, and although an indictment for treason was known to be depending against him in the District of Columbia, to the civil authorities in Virginia, to answer an indictment for high treason found against him there, upon a writ of habeas corpus contrived and concocted for that purpose, without making any return of the fact that he was held to answer for other crimes; and further, allowing him to go at large without any discharge, by due process of law, from the other crimes for which he was so held, without any claim to hold or detain him to answer therefor. The proof of these facts is clear upon the records. That the President did not intend that the leader of the rebellion should suffer for his crimes is apparent from the whole history of his detention. As in the case of Clay, he could not pardon him, of course, without a public outcry from one end of the land to the other. He was not willing to subject either of them to the risks of a trial by military commission, like that of the other conspirators, for the violation of the laws of war. He preferred the mockery, as it has proved to be, of an arraignment for high treason only, in a district where secession was not so regarded, and before a jury who had been, perhaps, accomplices in his guilt; and he contrived this process for the purpose of relieving himself from the burden of his own responsibility, and discharging the delinquent from the other charges on which he was held. The case is one of the like character with that of Clay,

The thirteenth article relates to the abuse of the appointing power in the removal of meritorious public officers, for no other reason than because they did not favor his policy; in the refusal to nominate to places filled by him during the recess, and retaining his creatures in office after the adjournment of the Senate; and in reappointing, after their adjournment, men who had been rejected by them as entirely incompetent. The cases under this head are numerous and clear, as shown by the records of the public offices themselves. That they constitute an abuse of the highest and most dangerous character, is shown by the judgment of Congress in the passage of the law to which they so much contributed—for the regulation of the tenure of civil offices—the same law which the President now disputes and defies. And they are not obnoxious to a doubt upon the question, whether they present a case on which the claims of the Executive to an unlimited, and uncontrollable authority over the public offices, may be brought to the test of a fair and impartial trial.

The next and last, but not the least of all these articles, is that which charges the exercise of a dispensing power over the test-oath law, in the appointment to offices, and payment of salaries to men who were notoriously incapacitated thereby from entering upon the duties, or receiving salaries therefor; and that on calculation, on the false pretense that loyal men could not be had for that purpose, and for the avowed reason that a proper policy of conciliation required that the taxes levied from a lately rebellious people should be collected by themselves, and that Congress might be allowed the opportunity of reforming its policy by repealing or altering the law so as to make it correspond with his views of what it ought to be. The offense charged here is one which is distinguishable from all the others in the fact that it involved not only one or many casual violations of a law, but a declared and systematic purpose on the part of the Executive to suspend its execution altogether, and that not upon constitutional grounds, or because it interfered with any of the powers claimed by him under the Constitution, but because the policy of Congress did not harmonize with his own. It is only necessary to observe that the last claim of the prerogative in England, which was extinguished forever by the Bill of Rights, was the exercise of a dispensing power over the laws, and the last act of the ill-starred James II, the very same that has been rehearsed just here. In both cases the law involved was a test-oath law, with this only difference, that in one case the test was a religious, while in the other it was a political one.

And these, let me say, are but a part of the many enormities that have been perpetrated by Andrew Johnson in the pursuit of his illegitimate purpose of forcing the rebel States into the Union upon his own terms and against the will of Congress. It would have been easy to extend the list, if necessary, by comprehending within it the repeated abuses of the veto power; the attempt to secure the vote of the Colorado Senators as a condition of his approval of the bill to admit that Territory into the Union as a State; the wholesale pardon and restoration of pay to one hundred and ninety-three deserters, with a view to the return of a Representative in Congress who would support his policy; the wholesale proclamations of universal peace and universal amnesty; the resistance made by him to the congressional plan of settlement; the connivance in the butchery at New Orleans; and the systematic encouragement of a spirit of disaffection throughout the South, which has resulted in the exile or murder of thousands of loyal men, both white and black, whose only offense was their fidelity to the Union. It would be difficult, indeed, to say what provision of the Constitution, or what law of Congress that stood in the way of his unholy purposes, has not been trampled under foot in his persistent, and thus far apparently successful struggle with the legislative power. There is enough here, however, to make the patriot turn away in despair at the idea that it is not sufficient in itself to draw from the surcharged heart of the American Congress a bolt of fiery wrath, that should blast the usurper in the midst of his rejoicings, and consign him to that infamy which shall not allow his memory to die among men.

Why, what and how many—to state the case in the fewest words—are the offenses charged here? Usurpations of power in every possible form that tyranny could have invented or imagined. Usurpation in legislating without the consent of Congress for the erection of governments by proclamation, and claiming for those proclamations the force of law; usurpation in raising moneys to a vast amount, without the consent of Congress, for the purpose of maintaining those governments by the appropriation of the public property and the exercise of the taxing power; usurpation in creating offices unknown to the law, and filling them with the enemies of the Government, and paying those enemies out of appropriations made by law for other purposes; usurpation in returning millions of captured property belonging to the Government to the original proprietors, without the consent or even the knowledge of Congress, and without any consideration whatever; usurpation and fraud in transferring, by a pretended private sale to the same individuals, other millions of Government property on long terms of credit and without security, and then postponing the payment for the purpose of securing his own private debt; usurpation in refunding to rebels large sums of money arising from sales of captured and abandoned property directed by law to be paid into the Treasury; usurpation in misusing and abusing the pardoning power to purchase the cooperation of the leading rebels in his unlawful plans of reconstruction; usurpation in not only refusing to enforce the laws enacted to put down the rebellion, but absolutely preventing their execution by arresting the process of the courts, and turning public malefactors loose without even a pardon; usurpation in the abuse of the appointing power by the removal of meritorious officers, and filling their places, without the consent of the Senate, with his own minions in aid of his unlawful purpose of maintaining his own governments and forcing them into the Union against the will of the loyal people; and to crown all, usurpation the most insolent and high-handed in the exercise of a dispensing power over the laws enacted to carry out the policy of Congress, by appointing rebels to office in open defiance thereof, and substituting his own will for that of the law-maker himself!

Is there nothing here to make his impeachment a duty, and his conviction a certainty if there is any virtue or honor or patriotism left among men? What could he have done more, if it had been his purpose to revolutionize this Government, and assume to himself the powers of a dictator? Why should you sit here to go through the forms of legislation, while there is a power at the other end of the avenue which is above the Constitution and the laws, and deals with you and your public property, and that, too, without inquiry and rebuke, as though it were the absolute master of both? Would the founders of the Republic, who staked their fortunes and their lives upon their resistance to the comparatively mild rule of a British king, have believed it possible that the time would come, and come so quickly, when all these accumulated outrages could be crowded into a single Republican Administration, and not only tolerated, but crowned with a final victory over the Congress and the people? What was there in the chapter of grievances with which the War of Independence opened—what in the complaints of our ancestors—what even in the long history of the struggle between the royal prerogative and the privileges of the Commons in England, unless it be the stout and successful resistance of the latter, that has not been repeated and rehearsed in this nation within the last three years? Is it the right to legislate by proclamation, which was at one time, in the estimation of the Crown lawyers, the very flower of the prerogative, and received the sanction of a subservient Parliament in the reign of Henry VIII? That perished substantially with the Tudors, but you have it here in more than its pristine luxuriance, in the establishment of governments, as well as in the enactment of laws, until it has come to hold a conspicuous place in the very volumes of your Statutes-at-Large. Is it the right to govern without a Parliament, and to tax the people without their own consent? That was extinguished upon the scaffold from which rolled the head of the self-willed, and unfortunate Charles I; but you have it here in renovated strength in the whole history of that long interregnum of Congress, when Andrew Johnson was scattering your property broadcast among his retainers, and authorizing his governors to levy taxes from the conquered people. Is it that last remnant of the prerogative, the right to exercise a dispensing power over the laws? That perished with the last of the Stuarts, and was the very weight that pulled him down. But you have that too here, on American soil, in the confessed and intentional dispensation with your test-oath law. What more do you want, then, to convict this man?

If he had intended to make a case for you, could he have made it stronger? Where do the records of Parliament furnish one that combined so many atrocities, so many violations of law, so many open attacks upon the liberties of a free people? What was there in the attempt to remove a Secretary of War, great as was the offense, that could compare in real magnitude and probable influence as a precedent, upon future times, with such acts as these? If our ancestors thought it worth the risks of an unequal war to resist a claim of power that did not involve even the least of these imperial pretensions, how are we to excuse ourselves to posterity for the refusal to call this great delinquent to account for the much higher crimes which he has committed? Can we ignore these things and continue free? Are we degenerate? "Have our hands grown weak, or our hearts waxed cold," or are we to sit down and content ourselves with complaints about the shortcomings of the Senate, when we have ourselves refused to present to them a case wherein no sophistry, no scholastic refinements, no technical subtleties, no jugglery of words, can frame an apology for a refusal to convict?

But then it will be insisted, perhaps, as it has been on the recent trial by those who recognized the weight of these accumulated offenses, in the way of answer to the argument attempted to be drawn therefrom, that they were not made the specific subjects of accusation only because they had been already passed upon, and their truth either disaffirmed, or their sufficiency denied by the solemn judgment of this House.

That they were not charged is certainly no fault of mine. I trust I may be permitted to say, however, that the conclusion thus drawn from the previous action of this body is entirely unwarranted by anything that was done here. That there could have been any considerable number of men on either side who doubted as to the facts, in a case where they rested almost exclusively upon the absolute verity of the public records, and were, therefore, not even open to contradiction, was morally impossible. That there were any to speak of, on the Republican side, except the two dissenting members of the committee, who felt any difficulty in regard to their sufficiency in law to authorize an impeachment, I do not believe, and cannot, as I think, be shown. There might be, and unquestionably were, other reasons for refusing a resort to such a remedy at that particular time.

It would not be, perhaps, considered exactly parliamentary to say that the friends of all the aspirants for the succession to the Presidency might possibly have feared that the temporary elevation of Mr. WADE might disturb the prospects of other candidates, and therefore I do not say it. It might be equally objected, perhaps, that it was not respectful to the Senate, if I were to insinuate the possibility of a doubt in the minds of others, whether it could be relied on to convict under any circumstances. It would not be proper, perhaps, to suggest that there were men here, who could not see danger in the violation of a great principle, through oft-repeated and unrebuked encroachments on the powers of Congress, or in anything short of a rude exhibition that was palpable to the senses of everybody. It is not to be disputed, however, that the business men of the nation, and particularly the commercial classes and the money-dealers, were against it, because it threatened, as they thought, a protracted contest, which would interfere with the legislation of the country, and perhaps result in a great disturbance of values and the possible overthrow of the public credit, and that this sentiment was reflected by many here.

The same may be said of the timid Conservatives—the waiters upon fortune—who are always patient and long suffering, because they are always in terror of change, always hoping, without ever striving for the better, and always sure that even the worst must ultimately have an end. And, reflecting all these, if not forming and directing them, was the newspaper Press, the vaunted sentinels upon the watch-towers of liberty, sounding no note of alarm to the people, but either unconsciously or studiously withholding from their view a succession of atrocities that would have shaken all England to its foundations, while it was in some instances even disparaging the men who had labored to awaken the House and nation to a sense of the great danger with which they were menaced. Nothing is clearer to my mind than that the result was made up, as it is not questioned that it might legitimately be, out of a calculation of convenience and inconvenience, or, in mercantile phrase, a general account of profit and loss, and that the determination to resort at last to the extreme remedy of the Constitution, was only brought about by a conviction of its absolute necessity.

I shall be met, however, no doubt, at this point, by the argument to which I referred in the beginning, that if the House could not convict upon the case which it has already presented, it is idle to expect that it can succeed on any other. I now repeat that if this were even true, it should make no difference with us. The failure of another body to perform its duty will not serve with posterity as an apology for a failure to perform our own. It is for this House, on the contrary, to make its record so complete as to place the whole responsibility where it will then properly belong, and not allow it to be said hereafter that it had kept back a case, which was at all events essential to the understanding of the true crime of the President, and the precise import of the very isolated facts that have been on trial.

I do not agree, however, as I have already intimated, in the opinion that because we may have failed to convict upon the case presented, we can succeed in no other, and do not admit the right so to presume until the experiment has been at least fairly tried. I hold the opinion, as I have ever held it, that Andrew Johnson can be convicted yet, beyond a peradventure, if this House will present such a case as the facts will authorize. It makes no difference to me what influences may be supposed by anybody to have been employed to work any of the sudden and unexpected conversions which are said to have preceded the verdict of the Senate. I make no imputations myself, and do not refer to these opinions as indorsing them. But with even the worst of juries there are cases where a false verdict would be morally impossible, and this I think is one of them. When I shall see and hear the high tribunal charged with the trial of this case, solemnly decide that the matters charged in the articles which I have had the honor to submit, are not sufficient to warrant the conviction and removal of the President, I must needs believe it, but not till then.

It will be objected, perhaps, that it is now too late. I beg to say that it is never too late to perform a duty like this, where the delinquent is the first officer of the Republic, and his term is not yet expired. If it were the last day of that term, the example alone would be of inestimable value to the nation, in the mere vindication of the public justice, and the admonition it will furnish to those who are to come after him. The cause is still depending on an indefinite adjournment, which never yet either dissolved a court, or discharged a criminal who was on trial. It is not decided, and cannot be decided, until the Senate has responded to each and every article of accusation which has been preferred before it; and it is the undoubted right of the House to exhibit new specifications, if it thinks proper, and either with or without them, to demand that it reassemble, and proceed to judgment upon the whole case as it may have been submitted.

If it refuses upon such a case and under such circumstances to perfect its presentment, it will be worse than idle to talk hereafter about constitutional limitations on executive power. A people that will permit the acts enumerated here to go untried and uncondemned, cannot long exist without a master, if they have not a master already. The example will find imitators, which a triumphant party with an army of hungry mercenaries, will justify, and this high precedent excuse. The time will hardly come again when an Executive of this nation will find himself with more than two thirds of both Houses of Congress against him. It will come in vain, if there are not in this House men sagacious and sensitive enough to feel and see when its liberties are wounded in a vital point, and brave enough to emulate the heroes who died to defend it from the first great treason, by meeting its greater enemy at the gate, and calling him to answer with his office for the greater crimes of which he has been guilty.

My duty thus performed, I leave the case with this House and Providence.

SPEECH OF HON. T. STEVENS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty of March 30, 1867.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a short supplement to what I have heretofore said on the Russian treaty.

None of the arguments which I have yet seen satisfies my mind. The confusion arising in the minds of writers seems to come from their difficulty in distinguishing between natural individuals and individuals composed of aggregate masses.

In my judgment, there is not a particle of difference between the construction and binding obligation of a contract made between natural persons and one made between corporate persons. Once ascertain that in either case their compact has been duly executed and delivered by persons competent to exercise free will, then ascertain its meaning, and the whole question is solved. There is but one way to evade its execution. That is by bad faith. Nations are precisely like individuals in contracting and executing contracts, except being aggregate bodies, the chart of their creation must bestow power upon them. But when a compact between nations has become complete, which includes delivery as the final act, it can no more be abrogated without the consent of both parties than a bond solemnly executed and delivered. Its binding power adheres to and follows the nation through its whole national existence, even in the midst of revolutions and change of the dynasties. Hence the true labor is to ascertain the power of the parties and the fact of their contract. This seems to me not difficult to do. Every nation is nothing more than many persons incorporated into one. That one becomes as capable of binding action as any one of their number separately. Every nation has its rules and laws which fix the mode of the action of the corporate persons. When it has acted its acts bind every one of its aggregate millions, how much soever they may dislike it. In most monarchical Governments the sovereign has the sole power of contracting. But for this purpose our Constitution has put the whole treaty-making power into the hands of the President and Senate. No other branch of the Government has any right to interfere, nor does it limit the power by any enumeration of subjects. It cannot encroach on any power granted to another department, beyond that it is absolute. The Constitution vests the right to regulate commerce in Congress. Hence I have never believed that commercial treaties were valid, though they have been so treated by the nations.

By the Constitution of the United States, as I have said, the whole treaty-making power is most distinctly given to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. By another provision it is expressly declared that a treaty made in pursuance of the Constitution is the supreme law. No branch of the Government nor any State law can resist it. By the Constitution not the least qualification or assistant power is given to the President and Senate, either as consultative or assistance. The treaty, when once ratified and proclaimed, is a perfect instrument, and absolutely binding on the parties according to its terms.

If the treaty provides that either of the parties should do any particular thing at a future or distant day, such as paying annuities, that does not in the least affect the perfect validity of the instrument or its binding power. A condition precedent prevents operation of an instrument. A condition subsequent never does. A breach of it may impose liabilities, but it does not affect the obligation on the delinquent party, or the rights of the other party. Our Republic has agreed upon a mode by which it witnesses its obligations, and to which all nations give full faith and credit. We take the following as the formation from this very treaty:

Done at Washington the 30th day of March in the year of our Lord 1867.

Fait a Washington le 18-30 jour de Mars de l'an de notre Seigneur mil huit cent Soixante-Sept.

And whereas the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Washington on this 20th day of June, by William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, and the privy counsellor Edward De Stoeckl, the envoy extraordinary of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same and every clause and article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington, this 20th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1867, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-first.

ANDREW JOHNSON.
By the President:
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

HO. OF REPS.

Impolicy of Land Bounties, &c.—Mr. Julian.

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

This is the manual signature of the United States of America. Some contend that it is more binding than the hand and seal of an individual, because the broad seal covers many individuals. But how can one perfect obligation be more binding than another?

This obligation thus attested and proclaimed was given to the world on the 20th day of June, 1867. Every part of his stipulation was faithfully executed by the emperor of Russia. The treaty is duly enrolled in the chancery of the Russian empire. It is recorded in the permanent archives of the United States with her other treaties. Now gentlemen of great ability deny its validity because Congress has not sanctioned it. Will those gentlemen tell us at about what stage of the proceedings Congress should have been called in to intervene? Not, I suppose, before the negotiation commenced. When the terms had been ascertained should Congress have been convened for consultation? This would be a novel proceeding. When it was before the Senate in its final stage, if ever they must have been called in, will gentlemen look upon this all as anything but absurd? This treaty provides that the Government shall pay a certain sum of money in a given time. But that money cannot be drawn without an appropriation by Congress. Now, the remedy of these nullifiers is to get Congress to refuse to make the appropriation. That would prevent the execution of the treaty, but would not annul it. That would be a breach by one party only, whether a disgraceful one, the world must judge. It would require great fraud or subsequent misconduct on the part of Russia to justify it. No act of our Government could be the least palliation. All the departments of the Government, except the treaty-making power, might protest against it; it would not shake its validity. There it would stand a valid obligation repudiated by one party, but forever binding. This Government has issued millions of bonds held both in this country and Europe. The holders have no way to enforce payment but by an appeal to the national faith. Who would repudiate, and make American worse than Punic faith?

Let those who persevere in disregarding a valid act of any branch of our Government join the great repudiator, Jefferson Davis, and rake among the slime and mud of the Mississippi for the bundles of unpaid Mississippi bonds. They may still be as valuable as obligations of the United States if this appropriation should be rejected.

Impolicy of Land Bounties—The Homestead Law Defended.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe I am justified in saying that during my service in this House I have steadily defended the preemption and homestead laws of the United States. Whether the attack has come in the form of unwarranted grants of land in aid of railroads and other works of internal improvement, or atrocious jobs under the name of Indian treaties, or plausible schemes of bounty in the pretended interest of the soldier, or whatever other shape it may have assumed, I have constantly and resolutely maintained the rights of settlers on the public domain. I shall not now change my course of action. On the contrary, every passing day invites me to renewed vigilance and zeal by revealing some fresh conspiracy against the rights of our pioneer producers. I have already discussed at some length our general land policy, its evils, and their remedy, during the present session; but I omitted in that discussion a question of grave magnitude, which I then hoped would not again be seriously agitated in Congress. I allude to the question of military land bounties, and I must avail myself of this occasion to consider it, and in doing so to perform what seems to me an imperative duty.

I am opposed, very decidedly, to all schemes providing bounties in land for our soldiers. My opposition is based upon grounds which I desire to state to this House and to the country, and which, in my judgment, leave no room for difference of opinion among intelligent men who will give the subject their attention. One bounty-land project only have I ever supported, and that was introduced by myself in the dark hours of the war, when our soldiers so much needed its encouragement and support, while it aimed a deadly thrust at the rebel power. Early in the session of Congress beginning in December, 1863, I reported from the House Committee on the Public Lands a bill providing that all lands which should be sold under the provisions of the act of 1862, for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts, and under the act of the same year to provide internal revenue to support the Government, should be bid off to the United States at the minimum price mentioned in said acts, certified over to the Secretary of the Interior, and thenceforward become a part of the public unappropriated domain of the United States. It further provided that all lands against which proceedings in rem should be instituted under the act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, and to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, should, upon the rendering of final decrees of condemnation, be in like manner certified over to the Secretary of the Interior, and thereafter be regarded and treated in all respects as a further extension of the public domain. This bill, supposing the policy of confiscation to be exacted by the Government, would wrest from the rebels and set apart for loyal uses from one half to three fourths of the cultivated lands of the rebellious districts, and without disturbing the rights of property of the great body of their people, who were never permitted by the aristocracy to own land. It would simply reach the lands of the leading rebels, who were at once the chief landholders and slaveholders of the South; and it extended the homestead law over these lands, under carefully-considered restrictions, and provided for their distribution in small farms among the soldiers and seamen of the Army and Navy as a tribute to their valor, as a fit chastisement of the rebel chiefs, and as the basis of loyalty and democratic institutions in the States of the South. Had it become a law, coupled with the policy of striking at the fee of rebel landholders, to which Abraham Lincoln finally assented, the duration of the conflict would certainly have been greatly abridged, while many thousands of lives and many millions of treasure would have been saved. The great landed estates of the South would have been dismembered, and at the end of the war the Freedmen's Bureau would scarcely have been needed, since the return of order and peace would have been heralded by the advent of our loyal soldiers, with their muskets as their companions, prepared to defend as well as till their homesteads, while ready to act as policemen and avengers in the protection of the defenseless. The bill passed the House by a strong majority; but it failed in the Senate, as did the policy of confiscation, through the hostility of distinguished Conservative fanatics, who were then pettifogging the cause of the rebels in the name of the Constitution, including the most conspicuous of "the conscientious seven," through whose fatal agency the country was handed over to its enemies in the late trial of Andrew Johnson for high crimes and misdemeanors. So much, Mr. Chairman, for land bounties during the rebellion, the circumstances belonging to the history of the subject, and the moral to which they obviously point.

The war closed in the spring of 1865, and the history of the agitation respecting soldiers' bounties since that time is worth recalling. When Congress met in December following, the demand for an equalization of bounties had evidently been resolved upon by those of our soldiers who volunteered in the years 1861 and 1862. It was a reasonable demand, resting upon the fact that multitudes who had enlisted at the beginning of the war, and rendered the longest service, had received very little bounty, while most liberal bounties were awarded to those who come in toward the end of the conflict. Equality is equity; and the question was how to frame a bounty bill that would place all the soldiers of the war as nearly on a common level as possible. It was no easy task; and the financial situation of the country presented a serious obstacle to the passage of any bill on the subject. It was, however, earnestly agitated in both branches of Congress, and in the Executive Departments of the Government. The President was soon found to be decidedly hostile to any measure of equalization. He did not so avow himself, but his acts proved it. His provost-marshal general, as a sort of flank movement, made an official estimate of the amount required for the purpose of equalization, which, I believe, footed up from six to seven hundred millions of dollars. The pay department exhibited similar gifts in arithmetic, though it made the aggregate amount required some two hundred millions less. The Treasury Department tried its hand with similar results, several of its bureaus furnishing the most exaggerated calculations of the amount called for by the proposed measure, and Mr. McCulloch himself being especially active in the business of dissuading members of Congress from touching so dreadful a project. The effect of these executive demonstrations was soon made manifest. Congress admitted that justice should be done to our soldiers, but it was felt that insuperable financial difficulties were in the way; and the result was the birth of the project of land bounties, which rapidly began to take shape, and threatened to lure into its support a decided majority of both Houses. We had, it was said, over one thousand millions of acres of public lands, and with them we would pay off the soldiers without adding to the burdens of the people. I saw that the policy would be utterly ruinous to the country, while its promised justice to the soldier would prove a delusion. It was almost as wanton a conspiracy against the homestead law and the productive wealth of the nation as the kindred proposition of certain prominent politicians in 1863, to mortgage the public domain to our creditors in security for our debt, which I had the honor to expose and denounce at the time, on this floor. Earnestly entertaining these views, I was glad to find an early opportunity to express them in the form of a report from the House Committee on the Public Lands, in response to a memorial from New Hampshire soldiers praying bounties in land. That report, which was laid on the desks of members and considerably copied into the newspapers, showed so conclusively, by unanswerable facts and figures, the impolicy and iniquity of the proposition, that I hope I shall be pardoned for saying that it very materially aided in its defeat, and in thus saving the public domain from a most frightful scheme of spoliation and plunder.

The way was thus again opened, very naturally, for the consideration of bounties in money, and the subject was examined more earnestly than before. Calculations were made, which I believe were reliable, showing that about one hundred and fifty millions of dollars would be sufficient to pay and equalize bounties on the basis of eight and one-third dollars per month for the time of service; and after freely conferring with intelligent soldiers and sailors on the subject, I reported to the House a bill framed upon that basis, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. General SCHENCK reported it back, with sundry modifications as to details, and it passed the House by an overwhelming vote. In the Senate, however, it encountered serious opposition. The executive agencies to which I have referred seemed to be far more potent in that body than in the House. The financial difficulty was regarded as insurmountable. Besides, many Senators declared that the soldier, having received what he contracted to fight for, was entitled to nothing more. These Senators, however, were quite anxious for the passage of a bill to increase their own salaries $2,000 a year, which the House refused to agree to, for the reason, in part at least, that the Senate refused to concur in the bounty bill. The final result of this conflict was a compromise, by which the measure now known as the act of July 28, 1866, was indissolubly married to the proposition to increase the pay of members; and, under the motive power of an argument two thousand dollars strong, this cunning but discreditable project was carried. I am very glad that it had a Democratic parentage, and that a large wing of the Republicans in Congress opposed it from the beginning to the end. The bounty bill thus carried through was an insult to the very principle of equalization; and though it takes from the Treasury nearly sixty millions of money, it has proved almost as unsatisfactory to our soldiers as if no bill at all had been enacted.

The agitation of the subject, however, now gradually subsided. What had been done for the soldier, though it disappointed him, seemed to create a new obstacle in the way of doing more. The financial condition of the country did not improve, and although the House re-enacted General SCHENCK'S bill during the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, it failed in the Senate, as was naturally to be expected. Thus the matter rested, Mr. Chairman, till the early part of the present session, when a bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, providing for very large bounties in lands. The aggregate number to whom it promised bounty was two millions two hundred and forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty-nine, and it called for three hundred and thirty-four millions nine hundred and seventy thousand three hundred and sixty acres of land, for which warrants were to be issued and made assignable like those of our Mexican war. My facts are official, being based on the careful calculations of the War Department. The effect of throwing upon the market this immense issue of warrants would necessarily bring down their price so low that it would prove a pitiful mockery of the past claim of the soldier, while speculators would bring them up in vast quantities, and make them the basis of new and most fearful monopolies of the public domain. These and kindred facts were forcibly set forth by the committee in an adverse report, accompanied by a bill which they offered as a substitute, and which has passed the House, by which the five-dollar and ten-dollar fees required under the homestead law shall be remitted in the case of honorably discharged soldiers and seamen, while the existing conditions of settlement and improvement are adhered to.

Mr. Chairman, another land-bounty bill has been reported to the House and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and a majority of that committee, as I understand, have agreed to recommend its passage. Should it be reported at this late hour in the session no opportunity can be given for debate; and I therefore avail myself of the present occasion to discuss its provisions, and to protest against its enactment. It attempts to escape some of the difficulties already pointed out respecting land bounties, by providing that, instead of assignable land warrants, there shall be issued to the soldier a certificate of indebtedness for the amount of his bounty, computed at the rate of eight and one third dollars per month for his time of service, and drawing six per cent. interest, which certificate shall be used only by him or his heirs, and be payable only in land. This, in effect, though in other words, is the same thing as so many non-assignable land warrants. These certificates, as I shall presently show, would certainly be made assignable by Congress at an early day; but for the sake of the argument I will admit that their non-assignable character is preserved, and that such is the bona fide purpose of the bill. It must follow, then, most conclusively, that its aim is not to give land to those who really need it for cultivation. The fraction of our soldiers who are farmers, and actually want homes on the public domain, can have them now, under the homestead law; and under the House bill before referred to, which will doubtless pass the Senate, the soldier can have a home on the lands of the Government without money and without price. Probably a small portion only of our soldiers and seamen desire to go out and settle on the public domain; but those of them who do would seek title under the homestead law, since a gift of lands under that would be just as good as a gift under a law providing the same thing under the name of bounty, while the certificates of indebtedness would of course be used in the purchase of other and additional lands, to be held for some indefinite time for a rise in the price. Who does not see that this would be the exact operation of this measure? The lands taken under it would be withheld from settlement and tillage, for the palpable reason that no man would buy them when just such lands could be had free of cost. To argue otherwise is first rate nonsense. The quantity of land which would thus be locked up from the landless and laboring poor of the country is given in the following official letter from Secretary Stanton, in April last, in answer to an inquiry addressed to him by myself:

"In compliance with the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, for a statement of the amount of public land necessary to meet the requirements of the proposed bill, (H. R. No. 940,) 'to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union,' in the event of its becoming a law, I have the honor to communicate a report on the subject by the Paymaster General of the Army, dated the 2d instant, as follows:

"In a communication from this office to the Secretary of War, and dated March 31, 1866, will be found a carefully-prepared estimate of the amount of money required to pay the bounties under a bill then pending in the Senate introduced by the chairman of the Military Committee.

"That bill was substantially the same in its terms as this House bill No. 940, except as to the manner of making payment.

"The sum estimated was $253,691,100.

"In my letter of August 6, 1866, addressed to General Vincent, assistant adjutant general, will be found another carefully-prepared estimate, showing the amount required to pay the additional bounties provided by the law of July 28, 1866.

"The sum estimated was $38,634,300.

"Experience so far gives indication that this last estimate is rather short than in excess of the exact truth.

"Deducting this cost of the additional bounties from the amount of the first estimate for equalization of bounties, the remainder gives a pretty close approximate estimate of the further amount that would be required under the bill in question, namely: $195,056,800, which, in land at $1 25 per acre, will require one hundred and fifty-six millions forty-five thousand four hundred and forty acres. No note is taken herein of the local bounties not paid by the United States, for I have no means of ascertaining their amount."

The local bounties referred to, could they ever be ascertained, would somewhat reduce this estimate, but the aggregate amount may safely be set down as not falling very much below one hundred and fifty millions of acres. This immense area, enough for an empire, being equal in extent to the thirteen original colonies, save North Carolina and Pennsylvania, double the area of Great Britain and Ireland; and nearly nineteen millions of acres larger than the French empire, and consisting, of course, of picked arable land, is to be withheld from cultivation and productive wealth, in order that the soldier, who needs his bounty now in money may at some future time get it in the price of his land, which is kept idle at the nation's expense, and to the cruel wrong of multitudes who long for homes. We convert him into a land-jobber, and conspire with him against the productive industry of the country. We set aside the homestead law as to more than one fourth of the tillable portion of the public domain by excluding from it the poor who would coin their labor into national wealth, extend the borders of our civilization, and realize the blessings of independence. It is said, I know, that we are not able to pay the soldier his bounty in money, and that we have nothing else but land with which to satisfy him. This I deny. The nation is able to do justice to its heroic defenders, and cannot honorably plead poverty as an excuse. But if that plea is to be accepted, then I reply that we are still less able to dedicate to solitude from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of acres of land, which else might be carved up into small homesteads, to be tilled by their owners and made the basis of revenue and of national wealth. The country, with all its great resources, is too poor thus to cut off its supplies by wholesale prostitution of its means and its opportunities, and it could far better afford to pay the soldier a reasonable bounty in money. Not one acre of land which any poor man needs for cultivation should be denied him in the interest of those who would grasp it for mere speculation. A member of this House from Illinois informs me that in the western border of that State George Peabody, years ago, purchased thousands of acres of wild lands, which he holds to-day.

Settlers have established themselves around these lands, built their houses, planted their orchards, and created wealth. The grain and other products of their farms which are annually shipped to market on the railways made necessary by the settlement of the country, go to make up the sum of our national wealth. These settlers are every day adding to the value of Mr. Peabody's lands, while other settlers, who would long since have made them productive, have been driven further West in search of homes. The Government thus entered into partnership with Peabody in cheating our pioneer producers out of the homes to which they were entitled on these lands, and in staying the industrial development of the West for the benefit of nobody in the world but a single monopolist, whose home is on the other side of the Atlantic. I do not brand George Peabody as a robber, for he is known as an honorable, patriotic, and liberal man. The Government of the United States licensed him to do these things, as it has licensed other land speculators, and has been itself the plunderer of its citizens and the practical foe of national progress. But these evils are multiplied and compounded by the bill I am now discussing, for instead of a few thousand of acres it grasps many millions, and although the owners are multiplied the homeless poor of the country are equally excluded from this immense area which the nation pledged to them by its pre-emption and homestead laws.

Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this measure on the supposition that the bounty it proposes is to go to the soldier only, or his heirs, and that the certificates of indebtedness are never to be made assignable. I have thus given the proposition its best possible face, and have shown, I think, the utter impolicy if not viciousness of the project. I speak of course of the measure itself, and not of the motives of its friends, which I doubt not are patriotic. But the truth is that should it become a law, the certificates of indebtedness would be made assignable. On this subject I beg leave to quote from a recent letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he speaks of this bill in the light of actual facts. He says:

"I have examined the inclosed bill (H. R. No. 940) to equalize bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union, which I had the honor to receive from you with the request for a statement as to the probable effect of the measure in the light of the experience of this office.

"I find the bill provides for the issue to soldiers, sailors, and marines of interest-bearing certificates, to be used by them or their heirs in payment for public land which they may hereafter purchase from the Government; that such certificates are in no wise transferable, and that the interest may continue to accrue without limitation until the recipient may see fit to purchase land therewith.

"The act of September 28, 1850, granting bounty lands to soldiers who had served in any of the wars in which the United States had been engaged, contained a provision that the warrants thereby authorized to be issued should be located by the soldier or his heirs, thus preventing their assignment and sale. This provision gave such general dissatisfaction that Congress passed the act of March 22, 1852, authorizing the transfer of any warrant then issued or to be issued.

"The files and records of this office show that not one in five hundred of the land warrants issued and placed in the hands of the soldiers or their heirs have been located by them, or for their use and benefit; and further, that although the said act of March 22, 1852, made such warrants assignable, it is safe to assume that not to exceed ten per cent. of them have been used by preëmtors as assignees in payment for actual settlements, the most part having been used by persons to acquire title to the public lands for speculative purposes.

"Should the bill under consideration become a law, and by future legislation be so modified as to make the certificates assignable or available to the soldier or his heirs without becoming settlers on the public lands, there is no reason that can be suggested by this office why results like those in respect to the past issues may not be looked for in regard to the certificates contemplated by the present measure, the effect of which would be to transfer to non-resident proprietors large bodies of the public domain."

That, sir, is the authoritative statement of Commissioner Wilson, whose judgment, experience, and familiarity with the whole subject no one will question. That these certificates would be made assignable there can scarcely be a single doubt. The great body of our soldiers need their bounty now, and not the promise of it at some time in the uncertain future; and if the relative handful of the soldiers of our Mexican war were strong enough to carry a bill through Congress making their warrants assignable, it is quite certain the like thing would happen now at the bidding of the hosts who would demand it. Indeed, I believe some of the friends of the bill do not disguise the fact that ultimately these certificates are to become assignable by law, so that the holders of them may realize their value in money.

What, then, would be the effect of such legislation, both as to the soldier and the public domain? Mr. Wilson, in the letter I have quoted, says that not one in five hundred of the Mexican war land warrants were located by the soldiers or for their use and benefit, and that not to exceed ten per cent. of them have been used by preëmtors as assignees in payment for actual settlements, the most part having been used by persons to acquire title to the public lands for speculative purposes. He predicts very naturally the same mischievous results from the present bill should it become a law. But I ask particular attention to the following additional facts which I copy from the carefully prepared report of the House Committee on Public Lands already referred to:

"At the close of the last fiscal year there remained outstanding fifty-three thousand nine hundred and twelve military bounty-land warrants, issued under various acts of Congress, calling for the aggregate quantity of five million six hundred and three thousand two hundred and twenty acres. These warrants are selling at about one dollar per acre. Under the agricultural college act of 1862 scrip has been issued to non-public land-holding States to the amount of five million three hundred and forty acres; and when the States of the South shall have received their shares under the act, the whole amount of land covered by it will be nine million six hundred thousand acres. This will be the subject of monopoly in the hands of speculators, and the price of the scrip will depend, to a considerable extent, upon the quantity of it in market and of the unlocated military bounty-land warrants. The price has generally ranged from sixty to seventy cents per acre, but has sometimes gone much lower. As further affecting the price of warrants and scrip it should be remembered that over forty-three million acres of "swamp and overflowed lands" have been granted by Congress to the States, more than one-half of which is probably in the hands of monopolists; that about two hundred millions of acres have been granted to aid in building railroads and for other purposes of internal improvements thus inaugurating further and fearful monopolies of the public domain; and that millions of acres of Indian lands, by virtue of the most pernicious treaty stipulations, are falling into the hands of monopolists, thus still further aggravating the wide-spread evils long since inflicted upon the country by the ruinous policy of land speculation. Every day gives birth to some new scheme of monopoly by which the paramount right of the people to homes on the public domain is abridged or denied, and its productive wealth seriously retarded; and no one will need be told that, should this policy be continued, the opportunities of settlement and tillage under the preëmption and homestead laws must constantly diminish."

Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen to keep these facts in remembrance in considering the effect of this measure upon the soldier. I ask them to remember the present price of college scrip, the quantity of which is yet to be almost doubled, and which at one time sold as low as thirty-seven and a half cents per acre. Let them bear in mind the amount of old bounty-land warrants yet outstanding, and the stupendous monopoly of the public domain which is going on in other directions and threatening to swallow it up, and then ask themselves what would be the effect of putting in the market from one to two millions of assignable certificates payable in land. Every man can answer this question for himself, but I believe I am safe in saying that the price would fall as low as twenty-five cents per acre. Our Mexican land warrants at one time sold at from thirty-five to forty cents per acre, and this, it must be remembered, was before the enactment of the homestead law, while the quantity of warrants was a small fraction only of that of the certificates now proposed to be issued. The Great Republic, in speaking of this bill, says that after paying notary and attorney's fees the whole money value to the soldiers of such a grant would not exceed $20,000,000, and it would be a hundred times better for the country to make this payment in money, and thus leave the public domain to the laboring masses. The veil thrown over this hideous speculation is too thin to cheat the soldiers or citizens of the country. It should be stopped where it is. If further bounty is to be paid, let it be honestly paid in money, and thus close the door against further speculations in what is designed for, and should be reserved as, the homes of the industrious millions.

This is from the pen of Judge Edmonds, late Commissioner of the General Land Office, and one of the truest and most sagacious of our public men; and it appears in the columns of a well conducted and influential journal, which I understand to be one of the principal organs of the loyal soldiers and sailors of the United States. He adds, that "the soldiers have asked for no such measure, nor do they want to be made the objects of any such fictitious gratitude," and declares that "the obligations of the country to them would be nearly canceled should they knowingly and purposely allow so monstrous a scheme of monopoly against the laboring men of the country to be perpetrated in their name."

But while the bill would thus prove a violated promise to the soldier, its effect upon the public domain would be still more deplorable. On this point I take leave to quote again from the same report:

"All the evils of land speculation, to an extent as alarming as it would be unprecedented, would be the sure result. Capital, always sensitive and sagacious, would grasp these warrants at the lowest rates. Land monopoly in the United States, under this national sanction, would have its new birth, and enter upon a career of wide-spread mischief and desolation. Speculators would seize and appropriate nearly all the choice lands of the Government, and those nearest the settled portions of the country, while homestead claimants and preëmtors would be driven to the outskirts of civilization, meeting all the increased expense and danger of securing homes for their families, and surrendering the local advantages of schools, churches, mills, wagon-roads, and whatever else pertains to the necessities and enjoyments of a well-settled neighborhood. This policy would stop the advancing column of immigration from Europe, and of emigration from the States, which has done so much to make the public domain a source of productive wealth, a subject of revenue, and a home for the landless thousands who have thus at once become useful citizens and an element of national strength. It would, in fact, amount to a virtual overthrow of the beneficent policy of the homestead law, which has, perhaps, done more to make the American name honored and loved among the Christian nations of the earth than any single enactment since the formation of the Government."

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the facts embodied in this brief summary ought to settle this question in the minds of all men who will lay aside passion and allow themselves for a single moment to think. With me they are absolutely conclusive. I claim to be as true a friend of the soldier as any man in this Congress or out of it; but I am likewise the friend of the millions who toil, whether soldiers or civilians, and cannot, therefore, unite with any man or set of men, for any purpose in opposing the homestead law, either by open assault or the insidious policy of indirection. I am quite as unwilling to aid in its overthrow now, on the pretense of giving bounties to soldiers, as I was five years ago on the specious ground of paying our national debt. Its policy is constantly invaded by stupendous grants to railroad corporations, by corrupt Indian treaties which sweep away the rights of settlers and curse vast districts of country, and by the growing spirit of monopoly, shown in multiplied forms and threatening the very principle of democratic equality in the Republic. Sir, the duty to which we are summoned is not that of submission or acquiescence but of unflinching resistance to these unchristian and anti-republican tendencies of our time. No ephemeral advantages, if they were attainable by an opposite course, could atone for the enduring mischiefs to the country which would certainly ensue.

Mr. Chairman, if any further argument addressed to this House is needed I find it at hand. This body, in March last, passed without a division the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in order to carry into full and complete effect the spirit and policy of the preëmption and homestead laws of the United States the further sale of the agricultural public lands ought to be prohibited by law; and that all proposed grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads, or for other special objects, should be carefully scrutinized and rigidly subordinated to the paramount purpose of securing homes for the landless poor, the actual settlement and tillage of the public domain, and the consequent increase of the national wealth."

Sir, I am quite sure the sentiment of this resolution would be most heartily indorsed by the great body of the people of the United States. Let us stand by it in the face of all temptations. It utters the true watchword and rallying cry of the people of all parties, and its gospel must be preached and practiced if our great national patrimony is to be saved from the greed of monopolists and the rapacity of thieves. I do not believe this House will now go back on the record it has made. Indeed, some of the friends of this bounty bill assure me that they desire its passage because they believe Congress will soon carry into effect the resolution I have quoted by providing that no more of our public lands shall be sold except under the preëmption and homestead laws, the effect of which, they say, would be to bring these certificates of indebtedness nearly to par. I sincerely hope Congress will be wise enough to do what is predicted. I even hope for it at this session; but I deny that any such effect on the price of certificates would result. Such a measure could not interfere with the holders of college scrip, nor land warrants, nor Indian scrip, through which land could still be bought without the condition of occupancy and improvement; nor could it undo those huge land monopolies already existing under our Indian-treaty policy and swamp-land legislation, through which the trade in land will be lively for a good while to come. There will be ways enough left to buy land without the obligation to live upon and cultivate it after the bill I reported to this House some months ago to prohibit further land speculation shall have become a law. In no event would the price of these certificates give the soldier the bounty he is entitled to ask; but if it would, the injury which this policy would inflict upon the country, as I have already shown, utterly forbids its adoption. The soldier, if he understands this, will not ask it, and the nation has no right to entail upon itself a great and irreparable wrong in order to prevent a minor one, which it may remedy in another way, if any present remedy is indispensable. The best friend of the nation's patriotic defenders is the friend of justice and the public welfare; and the men who were unselfish enough to offer their lives as a sacrifice for these will never ask the representatives of the people to trample them under foot.

Missouri Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. W. F. SWITZLER, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 16, 1868.

The House having under consideration the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, from the ninth congressional district of Missouri—

Mr. SWITZLER (the contestant) said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had hoped the character of this discussion would have been such as to justify me, in view of my duty to myself and responsibility to the country, in refraining from all participation in it. Elected, sir, to the present Congress over the sitting member by more than a thousand majority, defeating him not only in the county of Callaway, but in the county of Pike, where he resides, by several hundred majority, and largely in other counties of the district, and my right to a seat here strongly affirmed by the almost unanimous report of your committee more than three months ago, yet in the face of these facts the sitting member has occupied my place in this Hall, misrepresenting the people of the ninth district, until near the close of the term for which I was elected. It cannot, therefore, be surprising, Mr. Speaker, that I am weary, weary of this long contest; and reluctantly protract it a single moment by any act or word of mine.

The fact is, I had no desire whatever to trespass upon the courtesy of this House, and I resolved not to do so except in one contingency, which I regret to say has already arisen, namely, that the gentleman from the eighth Missouri district, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who acted as counsel for the sitting member before the committee, realizing here as he did there that his client has no case in the record, conceived it his duty on this floor to manufacture one outside of the record. This he has done by a new issue suddenly and without notice sprung upon me and upon the country, one about which the committee, under the pleadings in the case and the act of Congress, could legally hear no legal evidence.

READY TO MEET THE ISSUE.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to meet this new issue; the issue of my personal disloyalty, unjust as it is to me and foreign as it is to the merits of this contest; an issue made here for the reason that the record of this case does not present a single fact or principle of law to justify the usurpation by which Mr. ANDERSON occupies a seat in this Hall; an issue which he at no time or place made during the canvass before the people, nor dared to make according to law in his answer to my notice of contest.

A QUESTION ASKED.

Sir, if at any time during the rebellion, in the numberless speeches I made to the people in behalf of the Union and to raise troops to defend it, or in any one of the thousands of my public writings or personal or official acts, I proved myself a rebel and traitor to my Government; if at any period of this long and bloody strife I proved myself disloyal to the Constitution and the Union, why is it, sir, why is it that the sitting member did not arraign me on that charge during the canvass in our joint discussions before the people, or tender that issue according to law in the record of this case? Then I would have had notice of it and been fully prepared to disprove and disgrace it.

But, no, sir; the canvass before the people was entered upon and completed, the gentleman and myself often addressing the same audience from the same stand, and not a syllable or an insinuation escaped his lips in regard to my disloyalty. On the contrary, in this very county of Callaway, about whose vote his counsel has said so much and knows so little, the sitting member sought to prejudice me, in a speech, by reminding the people that for more than a year during the war I was one of "Abe Lincoln's provost marshals, and the very man who enrolled them and their negroes for the draft." More than this, after the election was over and the official returns proved that the gentleman was defeated by over one thousand majority, and after I gave him notice that I would appeal for justice to this House, in which his political friends have an overwhelming majority, he uttered not a word in his answer and elicited not a fact in his evidence on the subject of my being a rebel.

MR. ANDERSON CONCEDES THE LOYALTY OF CONTESTANT.

Not only this, sir, but at the time we were jointly taking evidence preliminary to this contest in my own county, the county of Boone, and while we were before the court, I called the gentleman's attention to the fact that I had summoned witnesses to establish my consistent and persistent loyalty to the Union during the rebellion; stating to him, that although there was no such question in the record, if I had to meet that question here, I would swear those witnesses. The gentleman assured me that there was no such question in the case, and that it would not be raised on the trial of this contest before the House; and hence, although some of the witnesses were in the court-house at the time, I dismissed them upon the assurance that such an issue would not be made before this House. This the gentleman will not deny.

Moreover, he stated to the committee itself he had no charge of disloyalty to make against me. Yesterday the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAWES] in addressing the House said:

"The sitting member has made no charge in the papers against the loyalty of this contestant. He took not a particle of testimony touching the loyalty of this contestant. He was heard before the committee at length, and at his pleasure, and at the end in response to the inquiry of the committee he stated he had no charge to make against the loyalty of this contestant."

YET IT IS TRUMPED UP NOW.

Now, sir, this gentleman has gone before a committee of his own political party, where he was fully heard by his counsel, and an almost unanimous decision has been given by that committee against his right to a seat on this floor. And now, upon the trial of this case here, with my personal and my official records, with my speeches, editorials, and the files of my newspaper, fifteen hundred miles distant, I am called upon suddenly and without notice to answer the charge of disloyalty!

Sir, I complain, and have a right to complain, that a charge so disreputable to me or to any other loyal citizen of the Government should be presented under such circumstances.

MR. BENJAMIN INCUBATING A SPEECH.

The counsel for the sitting member has been himself incubating for the last three months the remarkable speech which he read to this House yesterday and to-day. Having heard of the speech and of its object, I called upon its author at his lodgings in this city and stated to him I was informed he had in type at the Congressional Globe office a speech on this new and irrelevant issue, to be read to the House when the case was called for consideration. I suggested that as no such issue was in the record it was but justice to me that he furnish me a copy of his indictment, that I might be the better prepared to meet so unexpected an assault.

He refused to give me a copy of it, stating at the time—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let me say a word right here.

Mr. SWITZLER. The gentleman will keep just as cool as the temperature will permit.

The SPEAKER. Does the contestant yield to the member from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN?]

Mr. SWITZLER. I do not yield. I will say that the gentleman at the same time that he refused me a copy of this speech which he had been hatching for three months, purported verbally to give me what the charges were that he would make against me, promising that a copy of the speech would finally be furnished to me. It has been furnished to me at the same instant of time that it has been furnished to this House and to the country.

But my friend, the sitting member, sadly beleaguered, is now passing through "the heated term," and is to-day seeking to buffet the waves of a terrible storm; and it is therefore not surprising that he and his counsel are perfectly willing to accept safe anchorage in any harbor, no difference where, no difference what.

Sir, I affect no contempt for the honor of a seat in Congress, especially as the Representative of so noble a constituency as mine, nor do I pretend to be unmoved by a generous ambition to achieve that great distinction, yet, be the consequences to me personally or politically what they may, no gentleman here or elsewhere, in Congress or out of Congress, shall with impunity assail my loyalty or the loyalty of my constituents to the Constitution and the Union.

THE WAR CARRIED INTO THE ENEMY'S COUNTRY.

During the bloody and fratricidal war from which our country is but too slowly emerging, I suffered and sacrificed too much for the brave old flag of the Republic and to overthrow the rebellion now to allow political partisans, especially for the purpose of foisting themselves upon an unwilling people, to misrepresent my opinions and conduct; and if in meeting this new issue and confronting this sudden assault I shall deem myself provoked to carry the war into the enemy's country, and to strip the lion's skin of superlative loyalty not only from the limbs of the sitting member, but from his counsel, by the most extraordinary exposure that was ever made in Congress of the unenviable record of any public man, let the gentlemen remember that this is an issue not of my seeking or provoking, nor shall it be one of my avoiding.

Before it is concluded, if I do not mistake the power of truth over this House and the country, these gentlemen will realize that there are blows to receive as well as blows to give; and that as long as they shall have here a habitation and a name or the memory of the indiscretions of this day survive them they will be pointed to as monuments of the truth of the old maxim, that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

PROVINCE OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Speaker, if I do not mistake the functions of this House, called at this time to judge of the election, return, and qualifications of one of its members, it is here to decide a question of law and of fact, and that only. Certainly I do not understand that it is transformed into a body of electors, Democratic and Republican, assembled at the polls in the ninth congressional district of Missouri to declare through the ballot-box their party preferences, or to attest their adherence to party platforms by voting for the candidate who is the representative of a particular mode of reconstruction by Congress, by the President, or by neither, or of a particular measure of national finance, rule of suffrage, or foreign policy. The members of this House are not here, as I understand, to decide at this time whether the political party views of the sitting member or of the contestant are orthodox or heterodox; for if this were the province of this House, the sacred right of representation and of free elections by the people were a delusion and a farce. Recognizing the right of a free people to be represented in this Hall by the man of their choice, your Committee of Elections has been appointed, and you consider of their report, not certainly to decide whom a majority of this House prefer, but to ascertain and declare whom the people themselves have chosen.

To this end, therefore, this is not a partisan body. It is a court of law ordained by the Constitution; a court above the transitory and ever-changing platforms of political parties, and secure on the higher and ever-enduring plane of constitutional government, in which the voice of the people is the supreme law. The right of representation, the right of the people to choose their own rulers, underlies civil government on this continent. But for this right, no member of this House is secure in his seat. Planting myself on that right to-day, pledging myself anew to its defense, a right most flagrantly violated by the sitting member in assuming to represent a district in which he was defeated by more than one thousand majority, I realize that in confronting this usurpation, humble as I am, I am standing in the Thermopylæ of the people's liberties.

MR. BENJAMIN'S "LOYALTY" UNMASKED.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that in the time allowed me I shall be able to go through the record which I have before me; but while avoiding all discussion of the merits of this case, leaving that question with the committee and the House, my purpose will be first to measure these two gentlemen [Messrs. ANDERSON and BENJAMIN] by the standard of loyalty which they themselves erect, pledging myself to the House and the country that if I cannot establish a better claim to loyalty to the Union and the Constitution than either of them I will abandon this contest, pack my valise, and take the next train for Missouri. If I cannot establish that during the dark and bloody war through which we have passed I did more in behalf of the Union of the States and to crush out the rebellion and restore peace to the country than both of them put together, then I mistake the truths of our recent history and misjudge their power over the convictions of honest minds.

The gentleman who has appeared upon this floor as the counsel of the sitting member, as he appeared before the committee in the same capacity, referred in the speech which he made yesterday, in a spirit of censure and reproach, to the county of Callaway as being "under the domination of the old slave aristocracy;" and in the same connection he sought to prejudice the people of Boone county by the statement that "they rolled slavery as a sweet morsel under their tongues." Now, sir, if there be a gentleman in political life in the United States, North or South, East or West, who in times past oftener rolled slavery under his tongue as a sweet morsel and with greater relish than the gentleman who appears here as counsel of the sitting member I confess myself ignorant of his history; and this is true not only of the counsel, but the client; for these two gentlemen in the State of Missouri previous to the rebellion were regarded as the most radical, ferocious, uncompromising, and intolerant pro-slavery men in the State. No men North or South uttered, previous to the rebellion, more bitter denunciations against the Republican party and the abolitionists than these two would-be patron saints of radicalism and negro suffrage. No two public men of our time affiliated more kindly with the old slave aristocracy or rolled under their tongues with greater relish the sweet morsel of slavery than ANDERSON and BENJAMIN; gentlemen who, for reasons good or bad, have abandoned the convictions of their former lives and now profess a living and an honest faith in the vagaries of the new philosophy; have like the pendulum of a clock vibrated from one extreme to the other—from radical pro-slaveryism to radical abolitionism.

THEIR BARK PRO-SLAVERYISM.

Now, the gentleman from the eighth district of Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] was previous to the war a pro-slavery Democrat of the most ultra type. He was a James Buchanan, Claiborne F. Jackson, pro-Leocompton, anti-Benton Democrat, who not only believed that slavery was an institution over which Congress under the Constitution had no power in Territory or State, but belonged to and was a leader of the party who believed that that which he and his now call "the sum of all villainies," the black prince of slavery, came in a direct line from the pure, white throne of Jehovah.

Sir, it was no idle menace of mine when I promised to unmask the unenviable and rebel records of these gentlemen, rebel according to the measure by which they have sought to determine my loyalty to the Union. Judged by this standard they are, or were, both disloyal and "steeped in treason;" and if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] be a fair-minded man, impartial, and superior to the tricks of party, he will amend his motion to recommit so as to charge the Committee of Elections with the duty of inquiring into Mr. Anderson's loyalty is well as my own.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state to the gentleman that if charges are preferred against the loyalty of the sitting member I will amend my motion so as to include them.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Also include those against me.

Mr. SWITZLER. I will include the counsel as well as the client.

MR. BENJAMIN IN 1853.

Mr. Speaker, in order to conform to the example set me by the counsel for the sitting member, I shall send this letter of the gentleman to the Clerk that he may read it—a letter which will disclose to the country Mr. BENJAMIN's former estimate of those with whom he now politically affiliates.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHELBYVILLE, MISSOURI, June 29, 1853.

Editor Republican:

"Sir: My attention has just been directed to a letter in the St. Louis Democrat, in which a correspondent of that paper writing from Alexandria under date of the 13th ultimo, says: efforts are being made in this district to induce J. F. BENJAMIN, esq., of Shelby county, to become the free labor candidate for Congress in opposition to General Clark. As there is no person in Shelby county whose name exactly corresponds with the above, I presume I am the one alluded to. Permit me through your paper to say to the Democrat and its confederates in the third district that they need make no further "efforts" in that way; that I am a national Democrat; that at the ensuing election I shall support the Democratic ticket, as I always have done, including General Clark for Congress; that I have been fighting abolitionists for twenty years, and expect to do so for twenty years to come, should I live that long and they have a political existence. What could have led any person or party to suppose for one moment that I could be influenced to give "aid and comfort" to the abolition party of Missouri I am at a loss to conjecture. J. F. BENJAMIN."

Mr. BENJAMIN. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. SWITZLER. Shelbyville, June 29, 1853. The gentleman, it will be perceived, in this letter expressed great astonishment that any citizen would for a moment suppose that he would become the free-labor (free-soil) candidate for Congress. The mere suggestion was taken by him in high dudgeon, and lost some citizen be misled by his silence Mr. BENJAMIN deems the suggestion worthy of formal contradiction in a card. And this is not all. He is as full of contradictions as he is prodigal of promises; for, it will be perceived, after recalling a twenty years' siege of his against abolitionism, he promises to enlist for twenty years more and to "fight it out on that line," should he and abolitionism so long live. Only one half of the period has passed and abolitionism still lives, but what of the hand to hand encounters, the heroic "fighting," in which the gentleman promised to figure?

HIS "LOYALTY" IN '61 EXAMINED.

I desire in the next place to give you a short extract from the gentleman's record a little later in life, after secession had culminated, to show you, while he has arraigned me before this House on the charge of disloyalty to the Government of the United States, because early in 1861 I was against coercion, (as I was,) he and his distinguished client are in the same category, the difference being that they were chairmen of committees in their respective counties, reporting anti-coercion, anti-Lincoln, anti-war resolutions, while I was not even a member of the committee which reported those to the Boone meeting. The chairman of that meeting was then, and is now, a citizen of my town, a personal friend of mine, but the leader of the Radical party of the county and a supporter of Mr. Anderson. I mean Colonel Francis T. Russell.

On the 6th of May, 1861, according to the Shelby County Weekly of the 9th of that month, there was a public meeting in the town of Shelbyville, the residence of Mr. BENJAMIN, and in that meeting he was chairman of the committee on resolutions. I desire to read a portion of the resolutions which were reported by this gentleman to that meeting, as I find them recopied in the Hannibal Republic:

"4. That we approve the refusal of the Governor of Missouri to furnish troops to coerce the seceded States; and that the best interests of Missouri imperatively demand that she maintain her present independent, peaceable position, taking sides neither with the Administration or the seceded States, but using every honorable means to bring about peace and thus avert the awful calamities that are about to burst upon us."

The eighth resolution reported by Mr. BENJAMIN, who now claims to be superlatively loyal and the exponent of superlative radicalism in Missouri, is as follows:

"8. That if the State Convention pass an ordinance of secession, and it be fairly ratified by a majority of the people at the polls, we will cheerfully submit. But we are prepared to resist any tyrannical usurpation of those in office, whether executive or legislative, to foist that measure on the people of Missouri."

Now, sir, these resolutions, according to the authorities cited, were introduced by Mr. BENJAMIN, chairman of the committee on resolutions, and passed in Shelbyville, Missouri, in May, 1861.

MR. ANDERSON'S "LOYALTY" EXAMINED.

Just previous to that time, that is to say, in April—the 25th of April, 1861—the sitting member [Mr. ANDERSON] was a prominent actor in a meeting in the county of Pike, where he resides. There, as chairman of the committee on resolutions, he exhibited that unadulterated and superlative loyalty for which he claims merit here, and in order that the House and the country may see that those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones I beg to read some resolutions introduced by him at this meeting:

"Resolved, That the national Government should be tried by its acts, and the several States as its peers and in their appropriate spheres will hold it to a rigid accountability and require that its acts should be fraternal in its efforts to bring back the seceding States and not sanguinary or coercive."

"Resolved, That as we oppose the call of the President for volunteers for the purpose of coercing the seceded States, so we oppose the raising of troops in this State to cooperate with the southern States when the acknowledged intention of the latter is to march upon the city of Washington and capture the Capital."

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Missouri Contested Election—Mr. Switzler.

HO. OF REPS.

tol, and when in its march thither it must pass through States which have renounced their allegiance to the Union."

Again, listen to the sixth resolution:

"Resolved, That the present duty of Missouri is to maintain her present independent position, taking sides not with the Administration and not with the seceding States, but with the Union against them both, declaring her soil to be saved from the hostile tread of either, and if necessary to make the declaration good with her strong right arm."

Here, plainly and vigorously stated, are the doctrines of non-coercion and "sacred soil," and opposition to Missouri's responding to President Lincoln's call for four regiments of volunteers "for the purpose of coercing the seceding States"—all to be made good with Missouri's "strong right arm."

A BRACE OF LOYALISTS.

Now, sir, a meeting was held in Boone county on the 3d of May of that same year, and what was done? Why, sir, the Union men of Boone county—for if there were at that time or if there are at this time any Union men in that county they were at that meeting—observing that these distinguished loyalists, one in the county of Shelby and the other in the county of Pike, had reported resolutions against the Governor of the State responding to the President's call for volunteers, observing that both Mr. BENJAMIN and Mr. Anderson had reported resolutions at their county meetings against coercion and in favor of neutrality, the Boone county loyalists simply followed their example. And, Mr. Speaker, I confess that in that meeting I, like other Union men in my county, followed these bright and shining lights of loyalty; but I declare, since they have arraigned me before this House on the charge of disloyalty because I simply followed them, that I never will be deceived by such false and delusive lights again.

Why, sir, verily these two gentlemen seemed to act in concert, and for each other must have had a fellow feeling wondrous kind. Indeed, most appropriately they might paraphrase a verse of the good old Presbyterian hymn:

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in 'loyal' love;
The fellowship of kindred minds
Is like to that above."

A DOUBLE CHERRY.

In truth, sir, this adorable brace of simon-pure loyalists recall an old apostrophe, which, altered for the occasion, may be rendered: BENJAMIN and Anderson, Shelby and Pike, counsel and client, Damon and Pythias, Hermia and Helen; a double anti-coercion, anti-Lincoln cherry. Why, sir, Helen in Midsommer Night's Dream, in addressing Hermia, photographs this transcendently loyal couple. Listen:

"We, Hermia, like two artificial gods,
Have with our needles created both one flower,
Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key,
As if our hands, our sides, voices and minds
Had been incorporate. So we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet an union in partition.
Two 'loyal' berries molded on one stem,
So with two seeming bodies, but one heart."

POSITION CANDIDLY STATED.

But this is not all. The good people of the terribly calumniated county of Callaway, and of Boone, have been arraigned by the sitting member on the charge that they are unfriendly to the Republican or Radical party. I have been arraigned both before the committee and House on the same charge.

Mr. Speaker, a large majority of the members of this House may not very well relish the fact, or contemplate it with either delight or composure, that there are in Callaway and Boone, and even in Pike and every county of my district, hundreds of loyal citizens who are earnestly opposed to the policy of the Radical party; but I hope all the honest members of that party in this House entertain no repugnance to candor and frankness in political opponents, or to honest men wherever found.

I claim to be very candid and frank and honest in my convictions of public duty. So are my constituents. In all candor, then, I confess that the charge is true that I am an enemy of the Radical party; the charge is true that I am not an abolitionist. I never was an abolitionist, and I declare to this House, with all the freedom and frankness of my nature, be the consequences to me what they may, I was not an abolitionist before the war, or during the war, and am not one since the war. During the contest preceding the rebellion I was an old-line, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster Whig. I never was an abolitionist, and never expect to be. I claim, however, honest convictions in reference to all great questions which divide the country, and I would not conceal from this House or from the country any sentiment I now entertain or ever entertained in order to obtain a seat in the Fortieth Congress or in forty Congresses like it.

MR. ANDERSON AS AN EDITOR—HE "GOES" FOR THE EMANCIPATIONISTS.

But, sir, am I the only gentleman who ever denounced abolitionists? Let us see what the sitting member himself said about them. We were told yesterday that the contestant had been an editor in Missouri for twenty-five years. Well, that is true. I have been an editor and am to-day, and unfortunately for the sitting member for two or three months in 1862 he was an editor, and a very poor editor at that. It was after Fort Sumter had been fired upon; it was after this capital was menaced by the Federal defeat at Bull Run; it was in an eventful and very critical period of the bloody and terrible war through which the nation was passing. At that crisis in the struggle for the life of the Republic the gentleman was editor temporarily of the Louisiana Journal, published in the city of Louisiana, Pike county, Missouri. This gigantic rebellion against the Constitution and Government of the United States had culminated; the respective armies of the two sections, North and South, had formed in line of battle almost across the continent, and the question whether there would be a recognition of the independence of the confederate States by England and other foreign Powers was trembling in the balance; yet at this very critical period in our history the gentleman wrote as follows in the Journal on the 22d of May, 1862. The editorial is headed "Emancipation in Missouri," and in it Mr. Anderson charged that F. P. Blair jr., and B. Gratz Brown (whom he styled the leaders of the "two parties of emancipationists") were "establishing newspapers all over the State" for the purpose of attaining emancipation, and invoked "the political death of both of them." In this article he says:

"We had hoped that Missouri would remain quiet on this question, at least at this election. Our hopes have been disappointed, and the issue must be met. We cannot avoid it if we would, we would not if we could. It is insisted that Missouri will have immediately to get rid of her slaves in order to invite immigration. This proposition is advanced in all seriousness by men who ought to have better sense. By what rule of calculation they expect to make the State ruler by depriving citizens of the State of millions of dollars' worth of property upon which they are paying high taxes is a mystery to us. Men opposed to emancipation must organize to prepare for the coming struggle. We have no fears of the result. Incredulous and argument will demonstrate the impracticability of emancipation, to say nothing of its injustice and inhumanity."

HE NEXT "GOES" FOR PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND THE RADICALS.

Then, on the 29th of May, speaking of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation, Mr. Anderson says:

"The sooner the President wakes up to the fact that the border States do not intend to part with their slaves the better for him. It seems to us that he ought to know that the people of the slave States have more sense than to bite at the Yankee bait thrown out in his resolution. The resolution is not worth the paper upon which it is written. Father Abraham must cut loose from all connection with the Radicals if he would restore lasting peace to this country. They cripple every effort made for the restoration of the Constitution and Union. Disunionists at heart, they only go for war because they believe it will destroy the institution of slavery. They go for the war, not to restore the old Union and the old Constitution, but to gratify a mere spirit of revenge. The President must continue to check the hellish schemes of these blackest-dyed traitors in the land. If he yields to them, there will be no end to this war."

THE ABOLITIONISTS THE MOST ATROCIOUS TRAITORS IN THE LAND.

Now, sir, this is not all. On the 5th of June, 1862, Mr. Anderson proceeded deliberately to write and publish his views of the political situation and the measures of Congress. It is made a charge and a very grave charge against me that I have constantly and conscientiously and honestly opposed the abolitionists. It has been a matter of grave complaint against me, even affecting my political integrity and loyalty to the Union, that I have been a political enemy of the majority of this House. Now, let us see what Mr. Anderson said, and I venture to declare that nothing which I ever uttered by tongue or press in the last quarter of a century against the Republican party before the war, or during the war, or since the war, will compare in bitterness and acrid epithet with it. He said:

"A man does not have to be an emancipationist or an abolitionist either to be a Union man in Missouri. Here an abolitionist is regarded as the deepest-dyed of all the damnable mean and atrocious traitors in the land."

And yet, notwithstanding this terrible anathema uttered by the gentleman in 1862, now that he is hard pressed by the facts and the law of this case, he is here before the House asking that he shall be allowed to retain the seat he occupies by usurpation and fraud because of the fact that he has recently fallen very much in love with those whom a few years ago he denounced as the most damnable and atrocious traitors in the whole land.

SELLING FREE NEGROES INTO SLAVERY.

But this is not all. I will give another fact and show how intensely and fanatically proslavery the sitting member was before the war, and how much in love with slavery he then was. To give this House an idea of the newborn and wonderful zeal recently manifested by the gentleman for abolitionism and the freedom of the slave, I desire to prove by this record that his conversion has been very sudden, if not very sincere.

In 1860, one year before the war, Mr. Anderson was a member of the Legislature of Missouri, from the county of Pike. While a member of that body one of the most atrocious and inhuman measures known to the history of our State or to civilization itself was introduced on the subject of slavery, namely: a bill to reenslave all the emancipated negroes in the State; to reenslave them by the diabolical processes of arrest and public sale by the sheriffs of the respective counties wherein they might be found—to arrest them, bring them to the county seat, and after advertising them for sale, put them up to the highest bidder on the horse-block, and consign them to slavery anew. I will read from the record in regard to that bill.

THE RECORD QUOTED.

I read from the official journal of the house of representatives of the Legislature of Missouri, adjourned session, 1859-60, page 282, so that there shall be no cavil about its authenticity. At the evening session of the 11th of January, 1860, in the Missouri house of representatives, Mr. Hardin offered the following amendment:

"Amend by striking out the third section and inserting the following in lieu thereof."

Listen to this third section:

"Every free negro or mulatto over the age of eighteen years, who shall have emigrated to and settled in this State since the 17th day of March, 1847, and his descendants, and who shall be a resident of this State on and after the first Monday in September, 1860, shall be reduced to slavery."

HO. OF REPS.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The amendment was agreed to by yeas and nays. Among the yeas I find the name of "Anderson"—the same Anderson who, for nearly eighteen months, has occupied my seat in this Hall.

After various amendments had been adopted to the bill, the substitute as amended was then read a third time and passed by yeas and nays—"Yeas Messrs. Abney, Ament, Anderson, Anthony," &c.

A THRILLING PICTURE.

Sir, could I command the pencil of Hogarth or of Missouri's own gifted artist, Bingham, I would attempt to paint or draw in outline on canvas this thrilling picture. I would attempt to exhibit to the mind's eye of this House and of the civilized world the scenes which would have transpired in my State had this bill become a law. I can at all events venture to ask you to go in imagination with me to the county seat of some county of my district; for example St. Charles, and there in the presence of a large number of people brought together by the sheriff's advertisement of bargains, witness a sale of emancipated slaves, old and young, male and female, made under the provisions of this atrocious statute. One Henry C. Machens, the "loyal" sheriff of the county, aided in his Christian duties, it may be, by the sitting member, is the master of the solemn ceremony. There, gathered from city, town, and country, are the freedmen and freedwomen and their children—slaves who had been emancipated by some Christian master on his deathbed, or who, by years of toil by moonlight and on the Sabbath day, had purchased their own freedom. One is sold to some slave-driver from the South. Another to a slave-trader, who snatches his "chattel" from the sheriff's hammer and departs by rail or river to some distant mart. Parent is separated from child, husband from wife, sister from brother. Freedom is exchanged for slavery, and home and kindred for strangers in a strange land; and all this under the bill for which the gentleman voted in 1860.

How appropriate that he should be present to witness the scene, and to add to its interest by rising on the steps of the court-house, before the crowd disperses, and speaking as follows:

"CITIZENS OF ST. CHARLES: For this deeply interesting scene you are indebted in part to my speeches and votes in the Legislature of our State. Remember slavery is divine, and an abolitionist the deepest dyed of all the damnably mean and atrocious traitors in the land."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the contestant be allowed to proceed further.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. How much more time does the contestant desire?

Mr. SWITZLER. Fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will be granted that much additional time.

There was no objection.

CHARGE OF DISLOYALTY MET.

Mr. SWITZLER. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to meet this new charge of my disloyalty to the Government. Unprepared as I am, I am perfectly willing to go before the committee this afternoon and confront the issue. Indeed, sir, I will submit the question to the sitting member himself if you will swear him, unless it should appear that being a member of the Fortieth Congress so demoralizes a man that he cannot do justice to a political opponent. For if there is in my humble personal history any one fact which is better known in Missouri than another, it is the fact that from the inception to the close of the war I was a Union man.

A LETTER TO MR. PASCHAL IN 1861.

The suddenness of the emergency compels me to employ such evidence as I accidentally have in disproof of the charge of disloyalty. Had fair notice been given me that I would have been called upon to confront this great injustice I could have piled the evidence mountain high. But that which I have must suffice. First, I have here a private letter written by me January 21, 1861, to Mr. Paschal, then the principal editor of the Missouri Republican, but since deceased. It was found among his papers and handed to me by one of the editors as I passed through St. Louis to this city.

[Private.]

COLUMBIA MO., January, 21, 1861.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to find that in reference to the great issue of secession the Republican and Statesman are together heartily coöperating in saving Missouri from the madness and folly of disunion.

Let us see to it that reliable, out-spoken anti-secessionists are elected, if possible, from every district. In this great work the Republican, with its large circulation and influence, will have much to do. I hope, therefore, to see you in almost every number unmask the demagogues who would rush this State headlong into the fearful vortex of secession, revolution, and war.

I write chiefly, however, to direct your attention to the doctrine promulgated in the Senate the other day in the debate on Hardin's amendment by Mr. Churchill; that is, that the Legislature has no power to bind the convention, and that, therefore, if a secession ordinance is passed, that body can refuse to submit it to the people, notwithstanding the explicit language of the tenth section. Let us, therefore, at once warn the friends of the Union to support no man for delegate who will not pledge himself unconditionally against a secession ordinance, but also that if one is passed he will vote to submit it to the people.

The secessionists will attempt to give us battle in every district, and by bravado, inflammatory appeals, and humbug, to tie Missouri to the perilous fortunes of South Carolina. Let us take timely action to circumvent and defeat them. I endorse for the Boone district.

Very truly, yours, &c.,

WILLIAM F. SWITZLER.

N. PASCHAL, esq.

UNION VICTORY AT THE POLLS.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk another paper, being an "Extra Statesman" issued by me on the 20th of February, 1861, announcing the result of the election in my county for members of the State convention. The Clerk will do me the favor to read what is marked, and the House to listen and see how much disloyalty there is in it. This Extra was also found among Mr. Paschal's papers, and folded in the letter just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Last Monday was a very inclement day. It was cold even to the fire-eaters; and especially disagreeable (in more senses than one) to those who attempted to buffet the waves of popular enthusiasm for the Union. These sat in at every precinct quite early in the morning, and rolled and surged with increasing volume and strength to the close of the polls, each wave in its proud crest mirroring a gorgeous reflex of the star-spangled banner. So overwhelming and terrific was the storm that the frail bark of Secession was stranded upon the rocks and broken to pieces at the very onset. It had scarcely got under sail before its mainmast was swept away and its little shirt-tail flag went down in forty fathoms water.

The table which follows will show that the majority for the Union candidates is tremendous. It is about fifteen hundred in Boone and nearly nine hundred in Callaway—making an aggregate majority of about two thousand four hundred in the District. We move that a public meeting be called, and the election be declared unanimous."

LETTER AND SPEECH AT MEMPHIS IN 1862.

I will beg the indulgence of the House for another extract. I might pile them mountain high had I known I was to-day to meet this issue. In 1862, it will be remembered, President Lincoln appointed General John S. Phelps, of Missouri, military or provisional governor of the State of Arkansas, and I was appointed military or provisional secretary of State of that State. In August, 1862, pursuant to orders of the War Department, he left St. Louis for Helena, the headquarters of the provisional government. I accompanied him. On the way to Helena, Governor Phelps and myself stopped at Memphis. On the evening of our arrival, the 20th of August, 1862, there was an impromptu public meeting held in Court square, which was addressed by Governor Phelps and myself, in the presence of the commander of the post, Union soldiers, Union citizens, and, I believe, General Hurlbut, and General Denver, now of this city, and General Snerman, who was then commanding that Department. On our arrival at Memphis, and after the Union demonstration in Court square, I wrote a letter to my paper at Columbia, Missouri, some extracts from which I beg to read.

Referring to the preparations in progress at Jefferson City as I passed through it, to reënforce the Federal garrison at Lexington, then threatened by Quantrel, Hays, and others, I said:

"When we viewed with delight all the paraphernalia of war before us—the squadrons of horse with guidons gaily fluttering in the breeze, the burnished bayonets gleaming in the sun, the brass field pieces as they defiantly looked upon the busy crowd, and hundreds of stalwart soldiers with hearts pulsating quickly at the thoughts of battle—we involuntarily said to the traitors who threatened the pillage of Lexington, 'Let them come.'"

"Not the least agreeable of our reflections, too, was the thought that for a short time at least we would be safe from the sudden calls, at unfashionable hours, and when not invited, of the guerrillas under Parrell and other rebel marauders, and by absence from homeescape, perhaps, assassination on the highway by some cowardly scoundrel who is hunting round for his 'rights' in the shape of good horses or good Union men—the former to steal, the latter to shoot or hang."

Alluding to what we saw at Cairo, I wrote:

"From the deck of the steamer, while at the wharf, we could see Fort Holt, on the Kentucky shore, and Bird's Point, on the Missouri, a spot the memory of which is sadly associated with the death of the heroic Lyon and the defeat of his brave forces at Wilson creek; for, to save Bird's Point from an attack by General Pillow, (which he never intended to make,) the then military commandant of Missouri, General Frémont, sailed down to Cairo in his fleet of boats and sailed back again, instead of reinforcing Lyon at Springfield. Bird's Point cost us Lyon! and if it were a point of gold, which it is not, instead of a point of sand, which it is, it would be dearly purchased with the life of such a man and the loss of such a battle."

Commenting on the Union meeting in Court square, Memphis, I said:

"A Union meeting in Memphis! Who, six months ago, when reading the venomous treason of the Avallanche and the red hot threatenings of the rebels here, would have thought of a Union meeting in Court square, every sprig of grass in which, and every leaf, and every flower, is impregnated with the crazy eloquence of traitors? Yet a Union meeting was held, a large and enthusiastic meeting, which responded vociferously and with a will to the utterance of loyal sentiments and to the denunciation of this causeless and diabolical rebellion."

All this looks very much like treason to the Government and disloyalty to the Union, does it not? So of the speech made on the occasion, which appeared substantially in the Bulletin of the next day.

PROVOST MARSHAL IN 1863-64.

Not to multiply extracts from my public writings or speeches, which might be done indefinitely, I nail to the pillory this shameful dodge by Abraham Lincoln's indorsement of my loyalty. In 1863, President Lincoln, without solicitation on my part, voluntarily appointed me to the office of provost marshal of the ninth congressional district of Missouri. Here is the commission, issued by President Lincoln and signed by Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War. In July of that year I entered on my duties, which were continued till October, 1864, when I was removed for supporting General McClellan for the Presidency, some of these very gentlemen then being in the Congress of the United States, and not one of them uttering a syllable or a whisper about Mr. Lincoln having appointed a rebel as provost marshal, and permitting him for nearly a year and a half to remain in office!

LETTER FROM A UNION OFFICER.

I will now ask the consent of the member from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] that I may read a letter addressed to him by a Union soldier, a captain in an Iowa regiment during the war.

A MEMBER. He is not here.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Orth.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. SWITZLER. I spoke to the gentleman on yesterday in regard to using this letter, and no objection was stated. At all events I will take the responsibility of reading it in order that strangers to me may not be misled upon the trial of this false issue. It is a letter of introduction to Hon. P. SAWYER:

FREMONT, WISCONSIN, April 20, 1868.

Hon. P. SAWYER, Member of Congress:

Will you allow me to introduce to you Colonel William F. Switzler, of Missouri, and to presume on my long acquaintance with you to offer a word of evidence in his behalf concerning the contest between him and Hon. Mr. Anderson for the seat of the ninth congressional district of Missouri. I "campaign" some in Colonel Switzler's vicinity during the war, and know that he stood up firmly and fearlessly for the "old flag" during our struggle; that he was considered a "marked man" by the rebel bushwhackers, and obliged to leave his house and sleep in the woods more than once to avoid being murdered because of his activity in the Union cause. He sheltered and fed our boys, of whom I was one; nursed them in sickness, and ever kept the "latch-string" out to us. I was left in his town sick, and his wife and himself sought me out, nursed me most carefully, and when well enough to rejoin my command the colonel himself became one of my escort to Centralia, where I took the cars for St. Louis. After the war I spent several months in his town and was almost daily in his society and that of his family. It was during the canvass which raised the present issue between him and Mr. Anderson, and although I do not agree with him in his political views of the present situation, I unhesitatingly say that I believe he was fairly and honorably elected by a majority of the legal votes cast, and should our House of Representatives so decide, I feel certain that no more fair, candid, and honest friend to the perpetuity of our Government will have a seat there than Colonel Switzler.

Your friend, E. A. SHERBURNE.

The writer was a captain of an Iowa infantry regiment; is an intelligent, noble-hearted gentleman, and a gallant soldier, to whom this House recently voted a pension because of disabilities incurred by him in the service of his country.

KILLING OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH.

But I must desist, for I shall not have time to go into all this record, comparatively small as it is. Once for all, however, and I trust for the last time, I will again garrote a paragraph from my newspaper, the Statesman, paraded by Mr. BENJAMIN in his speech, in regard to the killing of Colonel Ellsworth, early in 1861, at the Marshall House in Alexandria. The paragraph was published in my paper, a fugitive article from some other journal, just as there was recently a fugitive paragraph in the Evening Star, of this city, in regard to the Speaker of this House. I could not have written it and do not indorse its sentiments, as years ago I announced in my paper. It speaks of how Brownell "looks," evidently being written by some person who had seen him. I never saw him, and again thus publicly disavow the paragraph, hoping, perhaps, against hope that no Radical partisan will hereafter, even when impaled and hard pressed by the record, as the sitting member is in this case, palm it upon the country as uttering my views.

GOVERNOR FLETCHER'S LETTER—THE SLAVE COMMISSION.

Sir, unfair means have been employed to prejudice me and my case before this House, the whole object being to invent some subterfuge or concoct some sham issue in order to avoid a vote on the report of the committee and deny me my seat at this session of Congress. The Radical members from Missouri on this floor, as is evident from Mr. BENJAMIN's speech, are afraid that if the report of the committee be ratified Missouri will be lost at the next election. Hence the extraordinary efforts and the appeals to party power which have been invoked to shirk the issues of the record and to postpone final action. Hence the sitting member, although he had a full hearing before the committee and four months in which to take testimony according to law, has appointed his counsel "a smelling committee" to "nose" around this Capitol and elsewhere to trump up testimony ex parte and illegal, to bolster a cause hopelessly lost before a committee of this House. Hence Governor Fletcher's letter and the note of Mr. Mills of the slave commission, both written since the committee reported, neither of them under oath and their testimony not subjected to cross-examination or the usual tests of truth before a court. Both gave testimony trumped up for the occasion to answer a special purpose, and without any notice whatever to me.

Sir, I have this to say in regard to the note of Mr. Mills, April 10, 1868, wherein he states that my claim for an enlisted slave was rejected by the commission on account of my disloyalty; that he does not specify who deposed before the commission, or what acts of disloyalty, or when or where committed, superinduced the decision; that I had no opportunity of being heard in explanation or defense, for it was all a star-chamber proceeding of which Mr. BENJAMIN's speech on yesterday gave me the first notice; that accidentally, a few days ago, meeting with Mr. Marsh in this city, he being also a member of the commission, I was informed by him that neither my own claim nor any from the county of Boone had been decided by the commission. So much, then, for that.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of Union officers and soldiers to whom I would confidently submit the question of my loyalty during the war, and to none more confidently than the several commandants of the department of the Missouri and the provost marshals general of that department; Halleck, Curtis, Schofield, and Dodge, the latter a member of this House from Iowa, but now absent from the city. The present Secretary of War, General Schofield, knows me well, knew me during the entire war, and can easily be consulted. I will abide his decision in the premises; I will abide General Dodge's. A few days since I met in this city General Lewis Merrill and Colonel W. F. Shaffer, of New York, both of whom, for anything I know, may be in the gallery at this moment. Both of them differ with me politically, but they are gentlemen of honor and will testify the truth. Both of them, as officers of "Merrill's Horse," were in my town on duty with a portion of their regiment from January 3, 1862, to July of the same year. They know me well; and if either of them will say I was disloyal to the Union, was a rebel during the rebellion, I pledge myself to retire from this contest at once. Ay, more, if either of them will not declare that I was an active, outspoken Union man, unconditionally for the maintenance of the integrity and unity of the Republic, as an editor, as a citizen, and as an officer, I will trouble this Congress no further with this case.

Sir, the charge of disloyalty and the motion to recommit is a dodge, a sham; is a piece of poor party strategy designed to carry this case over to the next session of Congress. And this for the reason that the sitting member, notwithstanding his political friends outnumber mine three to one on this floor, is afraid of a direct vote on the merits of the controversy.

Gentlemen, do me justice. I am your political opponent, that is true, and expect to be to the end of the conflict. In this I am candid and honest. I come not here to ask favors, but to demand the rights of the people under the Constitution—their right to be represented by the man of their choice. Permit not the sitting member to take refuge behind this false and shameful issue, and thus retain to the end of the term a seat to which he is not entitled. Do me justice. See to it that he and his counsel face the line of battle as formed in the legal record. Your committee declare he is not entitled to the seat he usurps here, and that in law it is mine by more than a thousand majority. If I am entitled to it, vote it to me. If I am not and he is, confirm him in it, and thus end this protracted and vexatious contest.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. GODLOVE S. ORTH

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 10, 1868;

On the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1868.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Chairman, we are now engaged in the consideration of a bill providing for the payment of the money as stipulated in the treaty by which we recently acquired from Russia her American possessions.

Notwithstanding the exhaustive debate which this subject has received, I feel it my duty to present some of the reasons which influenced my action in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and which will determine my vote on the final passage of the bill. It is also due to that committee and the House, in view of our constitutional obligations, and the national importance which attaches to and surrounds this purchase that the principal objections which have been urged against the bill, should be fairly reviewed. This I shall endeavor briefly to accomplish.

What, then, is a treaty? It is "an agreement, league, or contract between two or more nations or sovereigns, formally signed by commissioners properly authorized, and solemnly ratified by the several sovereigns or supreme power of each State." Hence the power to make a treaty is an attribute of sovereignty, and one of the highest of those attributes. In despotic and monarchical Governments it is most generally lodged in the king or the emperor; in our Government this power, by virtue of the Constitution, is vested in the President and Senate of the United States. From the earliest history of our Government even down to the discussions which have arisen upon the treaty now under consideration there has been a wide difference of opinion among some of our most eminent statesmen as to whether the House of Representatives has any control over treaties so as to limit or restrict them or in any wise to interfere with their provisions.

This question, however, is more theoretical than practical, for amid all the various discussions which have ensued upon it from the Jay treaty in 1794 to the present time, the House of Representatives has never refused to carry out the provisions of a treaty solemnly made and ratified by the President and the Senate. Not a single instance is known where the House has ever refused to make necessary appropriations to carry treaties into effect, and it would seem that this universal practice on the part of the House would tend at least very strongly to settle the proposition that when the President and the Senate have, in pursuance of the power conferred upon them by the Constitution, entered into a compact or treaty that it is binding upon all departments of the Government and upon the people of the United States. What is the practical common sense view of this provision of the Constitution? By it we have proclaimed to the world that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall have right to make treaties. It is a power of attorney given by the American people to those two departments of their Government, giving notice to the nations of the earth that they are authorized to make contracts on behalf of the American people. It is a power conferred by the Constitution without limitation or restriction, and like a power granted by one individual to another authorizes the grantee to bind his grantor to the extent of the power vested. Speaking of this subject, Kent, in his Commentaries, volume one, page 165, says:

"If the treaty requires the payment of money to carry it into effect, and the money cannot be raised but by an act of the Legislature, the treaty is morally obligatory upon the Legislature to pass the law, and to refuse it would be a breach of public faith. The department of the Government that is intrusted by the Constitution with the treaty-making power is competent to bind the national faith in its discretion."

And again, on page 175, he remarks:

"Treaties of every kind, when made by the competent authority, are as obligatory upon nations as private contracts are binding upon individuals."

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, holds similar views on this subject.

Those gentlemen who, in previous discussions, as well as in debate upon this question, maintain the position that the House of Representatives has some control at least over a treaty, base their argument more upon their fears of the abuse of the treaty-making power than upon any logical deductions from the Constitution. It has been said, and repeated again and again, that the President and the Senate may act corruptly, may force partial and unsatisfactory contracts upon the people, and hence they draw the inference (a very slight one, it must be confessed) that the House of Representatives is a necessary adjunct to the treaty-making power in order to prevent frauds or abuses in the other departments of the Government. These arguments, if they have any weight at all, could with more propriety be addressed to a convention called to form or revise a constitution than to a branch of the Government deriving its existence from such constitution, and whose duty it is to give it support and efficiency. The treaty-making power must be lodged somewhere, and the framers of our Constitution, after mature deliberation and full discussion, deemed it most wise and prudent that it should be vested in the President and the Senate. They could hardly conceive that a President and two thirds of the Senators would ever consent to a treaty that was fraudulent in its character or inimical to the interests of the people. But it is said that no appropriations of money can be made without the consent of the House of Representatives; and hence the House, having this power over appropriations of public money, can refuse its assent to an appropriation to carry out the provisions of a treaty when those provisions are repugnant to its feelings and judgment.

But, are there not many instances in our legislative history where this House is called upon to make appropriations of money when the object of such appropriations may not be in accordance with their wishes? Take the case of salaries paid to any of our public officers—the law may long since have fixed such salaries—while the House may have endeavored to increase or diminish such salary, but failed for want of concurrence by the Senate, would the House be justified in refusing an appropriation under such circumstances?

Again, a law of a former Congress may have authorized a loan of money upon terms which are not acceptable to the present House of Representatives, would we for this reason refuse an appropriation necessary to meet the interest or to pay the principal of such loan. Let us not lose sight of the distinction between the words "power" and "right" as used in this connection. We may have the power to refuse all appropriations necessary to carry on the vast machinery of this great Republic, or to provide for the defense of its rights or the maintenance of its honor, but have we the right thus to act in our legislative capacity. Should we thus abuse the authority with which we are intrusted there would be no remedy until the close of our official term, when such authority would revert to the people to be by them transferred to other and more worthy hands.

But have gentlemen on the other side reflected how exceedingly limited a view of the rights of this House they have taken when they hold that we can only exercise a supervisory control over treaties which require appropriations of money. If the House can only exercise a control over such treaties, how are we to guard the honor and interests of the nation when these are attempted to be perverted by a President and Senate who act unworthily of their high positions. Can it be possible that the House will only claim this power when mere pecuniary considerations are at stake, and fail to claim it when the honor and dignity and the highest interests of the people are concerned? We have this power over all treaties, or we have it over none. If we, as the direct Representatives of the people, assert any authority over these questions, let us assert it to the full extent, and claim that in every treaty we have power to say whether it shall become the supreme law of the land or not. Why is it that gentlemen who oppose the appropriation of this money are willing to limit their authority to the mere question of paying money and relinquish it when other questions far above and beyond any mere pecuniary considerations may be affected by treaties which the President and Senate may see proper to conclude? Does not this position carry with it its own inherent weakness and its own refutation? For no gentleman, so far as I have been able to learn, has yet taken the position that the control of this House extends to all treaties made by the President and Senate.

I will now consider some of the special objections urged against the passage of this bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who has been most prominent in the lead of the opposition to this bill, plants himself upon three grounds. First, he tells us that the treaty was made in secret, and without consulting the American people. If he will look into the debates upon the formation of the Constitution, he will find that this was one of the reasons most strongly urged why the treaty-making power should be vested in the President and the Senate. It is frequently of the highest importance that transactions between one nation and another should be held in most profound secrecy until such transaction has been fully consummated. To make it known to the world pending the negotiations might and most probably would, in most instances, tend to frustrate the very object aimed at. Nations, in this respect, are like individuals. When A and B desire to enter into a contract with reference to the sale and purchase of land or other property, or with regard to any business or commercial transactions, they do not call in their uninterested neighbors and make known to them their objects and purposes.

Thus nations about entering into negotiations affecting their individual rights and interests are under no obligations, express or implied, to inform the world of their purposes and intentions. If treaties in their inception and progress to consummation were to pass through the ordinary forms of legislation, public to the whole world, intermeddling nations might resort to devices and schemes that would lead at least to entanglements, if not entirely prevent their consummation. If this treaty has been made in good faith by the high contracting parties; if it be within the constitutional purview of the power conferred upon the President and the Senate, the fact of its being made in secret is no argument against its validity. We must have faith in our Presidents, and we must have faith in our Senators. They are eventually responsible to the people, though not so immediately as we are. If in the exercise of their high functions they deceive the people or disregard their rights and interests, the time will come with them as it comes with us for the people to pass upon their acts, and to hold them to the same account as they hold all their public agents.

The next objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] is that "the property acquired by this treaty is utterly worthless." Now, admitting for the sake of the argument that this House can pass upon that question, I beg to take issue with the gentleman upon this proposition. Turn your eyes upon that quarter of the globe and see what has been transferred to us by the emperor of Russia. A tract of land in extent five times greater than the State of New York, rich in minerals, in wood, in furs, and in fisheries, rich in its navigable streams and the fertility of its soil, rich in that grand chain of islands stretching out its arms from the American to the Asiatic continent, and forming, as must be apparent to the most casual observer, the key to the commerce and control of the Pacific ocean. Upon the American shores of that great ocean you already find a busy, teeming, prosperous, civilized, and Christian community, vying successfully in the arts and sciences, in everything that ennoble humanity with their fellow-citizens upon the Atlantic sea-board. Cities have sprung up as by magic where, within the present generation, the wild Indian or sluggish Mexican had entire control.

And the arguments which were used against the acquisition of California, both in the Senate and House of Representatives, as a reference to the debates of those times will show, were hardly less vehement, and certainly not more reasonable, than those which are brought to bear against the acquisition of Alaska. While the world beholds this gratifying spectacle upon our own borders of the Pacific, what does Asia present to us? Japan has already opened some of her principal ports to the commerce of the world, and is ready and willing to enter into still closer commercial relations. We are her neighbors, and must inevitably control her commerce. China, ready to abandon the seclusive policy which has characterized that rich empire for hundreds and hundreds of years, is now seeking a closer fellowship and a more intimate relation with the nations of the earth; and while we are debating as to whether the money shall be paid as stipulated for in this treaty, we find a Chinese embassy in our own capital, headed by one of our distinguished sons, coming to us with open arms, saying, we too are ready and willing to exchange our commodities with yours, to receive the benefits and advantages of your advanced civilization, and in return to pour into your laps the rich and inexhaustible treasures of the countless millions of our own people. These events are rapidly attracting to the shores of the Pacific, East and West, the attention of the civilized world. That ocean, commercially so long calm and quiet, as it always is physically, will soon be the center of a commerce and of business activity that will rival the stormy Atlantic.

With the possession of Alaska and her hundred islands we can command and control the commerce of that ocean; with Alaska in the possession of a commercial rival such as Great Britain our commerce will be crippled, if not destroyed; and yet, in view of these facts, the gentleman from Wisconsin assures this House that this purchase "is utterly worthless." Already we are stretching our railroads from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The great argument used to induce the American Congress to lend its munificent aid to the construction of these national works was that by their completion we could control the commerce of Asia, bring it over our own continent to our great emporium, the city of New York, thence to be distributed to the various parts of the world. When now we have it within our reach thus greatly to increase our commercial advantages in the Pacific and in a proportionate ratio control the trade of Asia, we should rather be found unanimous in our votes upon this question than to be higgling as to whether we will pay the pitiful sum of $7,000,000 for so great a boon.

His third objection is that if we consent to the payment of this money it will be an inducement to the President and the Senate hereafter to make further acquisitions of territory. The gentleman has studied to little advantage the sentiments of our people if he supposes for a single moment that they are opposed to territorial extension. Does he recollect the history of the Louisiana purchase? Has he forgotten how intensely that purchase was ridiculed; how every argument which human ingenuity could invent was brought to bear against its confirmation? But the American people, imbued with a sentiment of greatness and grandeur which attaches to our country, not only consented to its purchase, but are ready, as recent events have abundantly shown, to sacrifice millions of treasure and thousands of lives rather than to lose the control of the lower Mississippi. So with the acquisition of Florida, itself almost a constant succession of marshes and morasses, with no mineral wealth, no large rivers, and with but little arable land, and to which the gentleman's term of "utter worthlessness" would be more applicable than it is to the territory of Alaska. But Florida is the key to the Gulf of Mexico, and we could not suffer it to remain in the hands of a foreign Power.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Orth.

This argument will not deter me. We may need other acquisitions, and if so, in time we shall have them. No American having a due appreciation of the interests of his own country will hesitate for a moment to say that we must own the British possessions upon the Pacific, and having acquired the Russian possessions the inevitable tendency will be, and that, too, within a comparatively short space of time, to give us those possessions. Let us plant our free institutions, and the energy and activity for which our people are so preëminent on the northern limits of British America as they now exist on its southern limits, and it needs no prophetic ken to foretell the effects which will be produced upon the immediate future of those intervening possessions. In an evil hour we relinquished our right to this now British territory, for our title as far north as "fifty-four forty," was regarded by our citizens as clear and indisputable. This territory must sooner or later come again under our jurisdiction, and the statesmen who shall be able to accomplish this result will erect for themselves enduring monuments in the affections of the American people.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] whose absence from this Hall on account of serious illness we all so much deplore, has stated as his principal objection that the territory of Alaska is not contiguous to the United States; that by this acquisition we are entering upon a new and untried experiment; that hitherto our acquisitions have been of territory contiguous to our own; that the strength of a nation depends upon its compactness, and that we weaken ourselves by acquiring territory lying beyond our own possessions. I cannot see the force of this objection. It is true that some five hundred miles of ocean travel lie between the northern limits of the United States and the southern boundary of Alaska, but has that gentleman or has this House forgotten that upon our acquisition of California, although the territory was contiguous, so to speak, to our own, yet we were separated from it by the almost impassable barriers of the Rocky mountains, and that our early emigrants and adventurers sought homes in that new acquisition by way of the Isthmus of Panama, through foreign territory, or else by doubling Cape Horn and incurring the perils of a sea voyage of thousands of miles?

But shall it be said that we will now lay it down as a principle to be adhered to in all coming time that we will only purchase or acquire contiguous territory? Would the gentleman from Ohio, or would any member of this House be willing to take the responsibility of refusing the acquisition of the Sandwich Islands, those beautiful islands of the Pacific, redeemed by American civilization and Christianity from heathenish barbarism, and whose people are almost ready even now to link their fortunes with our fortunes, to acknowledge our flag as their flag, and our Constitution as their Constitution. The American people will never consent to the adoption of this principle. They will acquire territory whenever and wherever their interest or their honor may lead them to do so.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] opposes the passage of this bill with his usual vehemence and his usual ingenuity. His positions have been rather in the nature of attacks upon the executive department of the Government or by appeals to the fears of the American people than arguments addressed to our judgments and understanding. He has drawn a distinction between executed and non-executed treaties, and while he concedes to the President and Senate or to the other powers of the Government the right to act under executed treaties, he denies to them such power under what he esteems unexecuted treaties, the latter requiring something to be done, such as the payment of money, which can only be by the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

The treaty under consideration contains eight articles, and of these eight but one relates to the payment of money. If his position be true, then it follows that seven of the articles of the treaty are now a part of the supreme law of the land, while the sixth article can only become so after the House has consented to pay the purchase-money. He states that the President has taken illegal possession of this territory, and in support of this position alludes to the fact that the purchase-money has not yet been paid. Does the gentleman suppose that if the House of Representatives should refuse to pay this money the treaty would therefore become null and void? The treaty depends upon no such contingency, the sovereignty of the territory and our right of possession passed by its ratification, and by its sixth article we become the debtor of Russia to the amount stipulated. Where is the illegality of the possession we have taken? The fourth article of the treaty provides that—

"His majesty the emperor of all the Russias shall appoint, with convenient dispatch, an agent or agents for the purpose of formally delivering to a similar agent or agents appointed on behalf of the United States, the territory, dominion, property, dependencies, and appurtenances which are ceded as above, and for doing any other act which may be necessary in regard thereto. But the cession, with the right of immediate possession, is nevertheless to be deemed complete and absolute on the exchange of ratifications, without waiting for such formal delivery."

I understand that in pursuance of this article the Russian authorities formally delivered actual possession of the territory, dominion, property, and appurtenances to our Government, and by virtue of such delivery we are in just and rightful possession of the territory. There has been no illegal possession; there have been no illegal acts; whatever has been done was done in pursuance of a part of the supreme law of the land.

But again, he states that the acquisition of foreign populations is dangerous to the perpetuity of our institutions; that by this treaty we seek to incorporate among us and confer the right of citizenship to men, women, and children who are alien in sentiment, in civilization, and in religion to our own people.

Mr. Chairman, this with us is no untried experiment, and taken in connection with the limited number of the inhabitants of Alaska cannot, even by the most timid, be considered as dangerous to our institutions. What is the extent of the population of Alaska? It is variously estimated at from fifty to seventy-two thousand. Take the highest of these numbers and analyse its composition. Almost the entire population is composed of tribes of wild and wandering Indians. In 1857 it was estimated that there were six hundred and forty-four Russians, nineteen hundred and three Creoles, and seventy-two hundred and forty-five aborigines under the direct government of the Russian Fur Company. The most reliable data do not place the present number of Russians and Creoles at more than twenty-five hundred, and the number of aborigines under control as aforesaid, at about eight thousand. Of course under the provisions of this treaty, citizenship is only conferred upon such Russians as may not return to their own country within three years, and to such Creoles as are now in that territory. To those who thus remain, as also the Creoles, this treaty gives, (as is usual in similar treaties) the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and provides that they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The treaty further provides that the uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country.

Looking, then, at these twenty-five hundred newly-made citizens, placing it at the highest number, is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] really alarmed, and will this House believe that he has just cause for alarm? He certainly cannot have forgotten that in the acquisition of New Mexico we incorporated with our population and conferred rights of citizenship upon at least one hundred thousand people, who were ignorant of our language and our laws and professed a religion different from that of ourselves. Yet the people of New Mexico are peaceable, orderly, well behaved, law-abiding, and attached to our institutions. Quietly and imperceptibly they have been merged in our population; their foreign and antiquated ideas have given place to those of a more liberal and enlightened kind. They are rapidly adopting our habits, our laws, and our civilization; and hence I repeat that the experiment of incorporating a foreign element by the acquisition of territory is neither new nor untried, and our past history does not show that it is in any degree dangerous to the purity and safety of our institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I must not forget my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] in this connection. His first position, if it were only a true one, would be the most formidable that has yet been taken. He asserts with boldness, and with apparent candor, that this instrument which has elicited so much discussion is no treaty, nor is it a law, and if he had only adduced some reasons in support of his position there would be an end to the argument, and the fate of this bill would be sealed. If no treaty has been entered into between Russia and the United States with regard to Alaska, then it is worse than idle to talk about paying to Russia any sum of money. Where there is no contract there can be no obligation. If we have received nothing from Russia, Russia can expect nothing from us. But I infer that the gentleman has but little faith in this position, for he immediately plants himself upon another, and that is that we have "already too much land."

An attentive observer of the proceedings of this House for the last five years, during which time (under the leadership of that gentleman as chairman of the Committee on the Pacific railroad) Congress has voted away the public domain of the Government by hundreds of thousands of acres, would come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when other lands will have to be acquired or else that gentleman's occupation will be gone. As already intimated, it would be about as difficult to convince the American people that they have too much land as it would be to convince a single individual that he ought not to enjoy and possess all that which adjoins him.

Following this up he takes another position, and that is that we have no money with which to meet this obligation. Is that gentleman prepared to announce that our Government is too poor to pay the sum of $7,000,000 in fulfillment of the sacred obligations of our treaties? Would such an announcement tend to enhance our credit in the money centers of the world, and at a time, too, when it is the interest of our Government to preserve its credit untarnished? He is too able a financier and too deeply interested in our financial success to assume any such dangerous position.

I have thus endeavored, Mr. Chairman, fairly to meet the objections which have been urged against the passage of this bill. They may serve to convince others that the bill should not pass; they have made no such impression upon my mind.

We have entered into a treaty with one of the most powerful nations of the earth, with whom our relations have always been amicable; a nation that, during the darkest hours of the rebellion, was our firmest and truest friend. When rebellion almost seemed a success, when the nations of Europe desired and were prepared to witness our downfall and dismemberment, when they had secretly aided the enemies of the Government, Russia hesitated not in her friendship. In those darkest hours she quietly moved one of her fleets, and anchored it in the harbor of San Francisco, and another in the harbor of New York. The movement of those fleets spoke a language which was well understood by the nations of Europe, and that language was "hands off!"

Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that this Territory is as worthless as the gentleman from Wisconsin in his wildest imagination has deemed it to be. Suppose it were as valueless as the parchment upon which it has been transcribed, are the American people prepared through their Representatives to say to Russia that we will not abide by our contract? Are gentlemen prepared to assume this attitude? Shall we say to the world that the American Government, whose honor has thus far been untarnished, will not abide by her solemn and plighted faith? Shall we by our act become open and avowed repudiators? If we do the people whom we profess to represent upon this occasion will most assuredly and most deservedly repudiate us. Our poverty will be no shield for this most flagrant breach of faith. Compared with our national honor this money is the merest pittance in the world. But who is prepared to weigh national honor against sordid dust!

No, sir, this treaty has been made in good faith, and in good faith we will observe all its terms and all its provisions. In doing so we but respect and reflect the wishes of those for whom we are now authorized to speak, and we show an example to the world that in our hands and under our control the nation's honor and the nation's dignity is as safe and as secure as it was in the hands of our patriotic ancestors who have heretofore been intrusted with its destinies. We have taken possession of this territory, our laws and institutions have been carried there by our authorized agents. The Russian ensign has been furled; the Russian authorities have taken their departure and in their stead are now the stars and stripes and the official insignia of our Government.

Shall that flag which waves so proudly there now be taken down? Palsied be the hand that would dare to remove it! Our flag is there, and there it will remain. Our laws and our institutions are there guaranteeing protection to its present inhabitants, and to the thousands who shall inhabit it hereafter. We shall take to those distant shores the arts, the sciences, and the civilization of the nineteenth century. Under our auspices they will grow and prosper, and commerce and intelligence, morality and virtue will still further attest the beneficence of American institutions, and add continually to the number of those who admire and love our country and her free institutions.

Taxation of United States Bonds.

SPEECH OF HON. FREDERICK STONE, OF MARYLAND,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 15 and 16, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. STONE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A great deal of the idle declamation on the subject of the finances is the result of the misconception of the law and a great deal of intentional misrepresentation. We hear repeated everywhere the importance of the Government maintaining its faith, but we do not very often hear it stated clearly and distinctly in what that keeping of faith consists. We have a large debt, and a portion of it is already due. There is already before this House a bill from the Senate, called a funding bill, which in fact was intended to provide for the payment of that which is already due. I suppose, sir, the only safe rule by which we can be guided in ascertaining in what mode the Government should preserve its faith with its creditors would be to ascertain precisely what contract it made with them, and whatever the Government may choose to pay more than its contract is a question for the Government itself to determine. The only rights which the creditors of the Government have are the terms of the contract that they made with the Government at the time they loaned the Government the money. In order to ascertain what that contract was we have only to refer back to the series of the acts of Congress. No one was authorized to speak for the Government except the Government itself. The acts of Congress spoke in language too clear to be misunderstood or misrepresented, and no man with a fair disposition to arrive at what is the true construction of these acts of Congress can read them and be for one moment in doubt as to the legal effect and equity of this contract.

In the month of February, 1862, Congress passed an act, called the legal-tender act, by which we made non-interest-bearing notes of the Government legal tender for all debts, public and private. They made in that act no exceptions but duties on imports and the interest on the public debt; these were declared to be payable in coin, but that every other species of indebtedness should be discharged and liquidated by non-interest-bearing Treasury notes of the United States, generally termed legal tenders. In the very same act, after declaring that these non-interest-bearing notes should be received in payment of every debt, public or private, in the second section they provide for the creation of a public debt making the duties on imports and the interest on that debt payable in coin.

Now, sir, is not that plain enough? If the law itself was constitutional, if Congress had the right to issue these non-interest-bearing notes and make them legal tenders in payment of debts public and private, when in the very act in which they contracted the debt they said the notes should be legal tenders, can the creditors who took the loan and advanced their money upon the faith of that act complain of any misunderstanding, that there was any ambiguity in the act?

But Congress did not stop here. To show that they thoroughly understood the import of the language they were using, two years afterward, in March, 1864, they passed another loan law in which they used this language:

"Payable at a period not more than forty years from date in coin, and of such denominations as may be found expedient, not less than fifty dollars, bearing an interest not exceeding six per cent. a year payable on bonds not over $100 and on all other bonds semi-annually, in coin."

They first said that the principal shall be paid in coin, and then that the interest shall be paid in coin, drawing a distinction between the bonds issued under the act of March 1864, and February, 1862. But that is not all. As late as 1865 Congress passed another act in which they gave the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion to make the principal and interest, one or both, payable either in currency or coin, so that it should be expressed on the face of the bond.

Now, then, here is an act of Congress in 1862 making these bonds payable in currency, leaving the Secretary of the Treasury no discretion. Then there is the act of March, 1864, leaving him no discretion whatever, for the bonds issued under that act must be paid, both principal and interest, in coin. Then as late as March 3, 1865, Congress passed a law giving the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to make the principal or the interest, one or both, payable either in coin or currency, as he might deem expedient.

Now propositions are being pressed upon this House which amount to this: that although the Government obtained a loan during the pendency of the war and contracted with its creditors to pay in currency, a gold-bearing bond is to be substituted for the bonds already due and payable in currency. Five hundred million dollars of the five-twenty bonds that were payable by the express terms of the act of 1862 in currency are now due and payable at the Treasury, the five years' option having expired. How are they to be paid? If they are payable in currency, what is the object of imposing a vast coin debt upon the Government now at this late day? If by the terms of the contract they were payable in currency why now issue a new set of bonds payable in coin running a long period of years, and thus substituting a debt payable in coin for one clearly payable in currency? The question is what was the contract with the public creditors? Not what a broker or a banker might say, or what might be advertised in a newspaper by brokers and bankers whose only object was to make sales for the sake of their commission.

One of the arguments used on this question is, that if the debt were paid in legal-tender notes it would depreciate the credit of the Government, and that the greenbacks would become depreciated and comparatively worthless. That argument proceeds upon the assumption that a debt of the Government, while bearing interest, will preserve the credit of the Government; but that a non-interest-bearing debt will destroy its credit. I presume that scarcely any one will question the fact that the credit of a Government depends upon its ability and its willingness to discharge its just obligations. First ascertain what its just obligations are, and then show a willingness to discharge them, and you need not fear that the credit of the Government will suffer. I deny the fact that it would follow as a consequence of the substitution of non-interest-bearing debt for interest bearing, provided such were the terms of the contract, that the credit of the Government would suffer. On the contrary, I believe that it would be increased. If the debt could be discharged by legal tenders, so far from disturbing it would only improve the financial condition of the country.

There is no reason that can be urged why the Government should be held to a different rule in the payment of these five twenty bonds from the rule which it adopts in dealing with every other creditor. The Government contracts to pay its judiciary so much money. The judiciary receives it in legal-tender notes, and does not pretend that the Government violates its faith. It contracts to pay its Army so much money. The Army receives it in legal-tender notes, and sets up no pretense that the faith of the Government is broken. And thus the Government deals with every single creditor it has, great or small; and we hear no complaint of a violation of faith except coming from the bondholders or their advocates. If we had contracted in the act of February, 1862, to pay the loan in gold, why we should pay it in gold. If it is perfectly clear that we contracted to pay it in currency, the holders of the loan have no just cause of complaint if the Government does pay it in currency.

Now, sir, we have had a great deal of discussion in the House to-night and some before as to the taxation of Government bonds. It is a part of the inherent power of Congress, given to it by the Constitution, to levy tax for the support of the Government, and to suppose for one moment that one Congress could bind a succeeding Congress as to any article to be taxed, whether Government bonds or anything else, would be to any one who had ever examined the Constitution at all, or the working of this or any other Government, the very height of absurdity. It would enable one Congress, as was very justly said by a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, by exempting everything from taxation, to put an end to any Government. The right is unquestioned, and while an exception is made in the acts of Congress exempting the Government bonds from state or municipal taxation, no pretense is set up to exempt them from the power of taxation of the United States, whether the tax should be upon the principal or upon the interest, or upon both, is perhaps not a very material matter. That they should bear their fair share of the burdens of the Government is now almost a concessum in this country, and is certainly sustained by every principle of law and justice.

But the great principle to be kept in view, as was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] is the equalization of three burdens. It is the correct principle at last that all classes and all property should bear their fair and just share of the burdens of the Government.

Sir, it has been sometimes argued by gentlemen that any material addition to the currency of the country would exercise an injurious effect upon the value of that currency. This is not so. More than one half of the country is this day without enough currency to transact their ordinary business. The business of the country would absorb and use profitably a great deal more currency than we now have.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to inquire if I understood the gentleman correctly when I understood him to say that after the Government has called on its citizens for money to supply its wants, and has received it, and has passed a law declaring that the bonds given for that money shall not be taxed, then the Government has the right to turn around and pass another law taxing those bonds? Is not that in the nature of an ex post facto law? I do not know that I quite understood the gentleman. If I did not I should like to do so.

Mr. STONE. In answer to the question of the gentleman I would say that I deny utterly the right of one Congress to prohibit all succeeding Congresses from imposing a tax either upon Government bonds or any other species of property.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The gentleman does not quite understand me.

Mr. STONE. I think I understand the gentleman perfectly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will state what I mean.

Mr. STONE. I think I understand the gentleman perfectly. Every citizen or foreigner, or whoever he may be, who advances his money to the Government, is presumed to know and does know—for men who make these advances of money understand the workings and the authority of the Government as well as and perhaps better than any other class of men in the world—they know that the power of the Government to tax is inherent and inalienable.

And they take the loan always subject to the inherent right of taxation possessed by the Government.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Let me interrupt the gentleman again for a moment.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The Government makes a contract with me, for instance; it asks me for my money and I give it. The Government then executes a bond to me and puts its seal upon it. Now, after having received my gold, can it tear that seal from the bond without my consent? I want to know if the Government possesses any such power as that. If it does, then I have yet to learn it.

Mr. STONE. I have already answered the question of the gentleman. I repeat again that no Government was ever instituted among men that did not possess this inherent and inalienable right. And no man scarcely out of a lunatic asylum ever supposed that this Congress or the Parliament of Great Britain or the Chamber of Deputies of France or the Diet of Germany, with all their executives combined, could strip the legislative department of the Government of this inherent and inalienable right. And these men took the bonds of the United States knowing that the Government always reserves to itself that power.

But the Government never did promise not to tax these bonds; they only declared that the States should not tax them. I will read from the act on that subject:

"All stocks, bonds, and other securities of the United States, held by individuals, corporations, or associations within the United States, shall be exempt from taxation by or under State authority."

That, I believe, is the utmost extent to which any of these laws go—that the bonds shall be free from taxation under State or municipal authority. Congress never for a moment attempted even to make them not taxable by the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, the funding bill is simply a bill to exchange bonds payable in currency for bonds payable in gold; nothing more or less. Whether it is wise, when it is impossible to have full discussion upon so important a measure, to change the currency debt into a gold debt, and thus to impose a burden upon the people of this country of certainly between five hundred and one thousand million dollars, notwithstanding the lower rate of interest on the new bonds, I must leave the majority of this House to determine. I myself deem it both unwise and unjust to the people that they should be called upon to perform more than they agreed to do at the time they incurred the debt; and when every interest in the country is now so heavily taxed.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allotted to me I feel inclined to adopt an expression used by General Blair in his late celebrated letter, in which he says the financial question is subordinate to the political one. This letter of General Blair seems to have created a great deal of interest in this House and out of it. It has been termed revolutionary and warlike. Now, I agree with and most cordially indorse every word in that letter. It is because I believe it is not revolutionary, that it is not warlike in the slightest degree, that I do indorse it. It is a plain statement of a question which he desires to submit to the people and to take their deliberate judgment upon it at the ballot-box. If you can term any question that is submitted to the people at the ballot-box, and upon which their deliberate judgment is evoked, if you term that war, then what do you term peace?

That letter of General Blair's simply declares that the governments set up in the ten rebel States were not warranted by the terms of the Constitution of the United States, and it proposes to submit to the deliberate judgment of the people whether the Executives should or should not be called upon to undo what the writer of the letter believes, and what I believe, to be an unconstitutional usurpation of power.

It is impossible that any revolution or war can come of any deliberate appeal to the ballot-box. If the people declare by the election that those State governments are unconstitutional, and that they desire their Executive to command the Army to undo what the Army did, surely that cannot be termed a revolutionary measure.

But there is a small cloud on the horizon. The bill so recently passed by both Houses of Congress in relation to counting the electoral votes of the reconstructed States is, in my judgment, a measure fraught with danger to the country; for, as I construe that bill, it certainly claims for the two Houses of Congress the right to receive or to reject the vote of any one of the ten southern States as Congress may choose. The Constitution is explicit upon that subject. It gives to Congress the right to fix the day upon which the electors shall be voted for and the day upon which the electors shall cast their votes. There the whole authority of Congress over the subject ceases; everything else in regard to the election is entirely and exclusively under the control of the States themselves; and Congress has no right to reject the vote of any State where the constitutional requirements have been complied with by the electors being selected upon the day designated by Congress.

Who but Congress is to judge whether or not the State government spoken of by that act was made in compliance with the act of March 2, 1867? By the terms of that bill the States may be here represented; Congress may have already passed judgment that she had complied with the terms of the reconstruction acts, and yet that act gives to Congress the right to count such of the votes as they please and reject such as they please. Once concede to Congress that right, and the election of the President is in the hands of Congress and not of the people.

That act must have been passed with some purpose and for some intent. The act of March, 1867, after prescribing what a State should do to entitle her to representation here, provided that after Congress did admit her Representatives the act should be inoperative. What, then, does this bill mean when it says that the vote of none of those ten States shall be counted unless Congress is satisfied, (I do not quote the exact words, but recite the substance of the act,) that at the time she cast her electoral vote she had complied with all the requisites of the reconstruction act, to be judged of by Congress again. What is the effect of such a law? It is either entirely nugatory, or it would necessarily give this body the right to count the vote of one State and reject that of another, both States being represented on this floor—a right claimed in the very face of the Constitution, which gives to each State the right to choose the electors in the manner that the Legislature thereof shall direct. If this power is conceded to Congress then elections by the people are at an end.

Local Bounty Debts, Tariff, Retrenchment.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN HILL,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 16, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HILL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have listened with much interest to the many speeches that have been made on the floor of this House in relation to the public debt, and the various modes suggested to relieve the people from the burden of taxes imposed in consequence of it; and also to the remarks that have been made in relation to retrenchment and curtailing the expenditures of the Government.

The people of this country are looking to Congress for relief, burdened as they are with heavy taxes. Any measure that looks to lessening their taxation will be received with favor by them. To my mind there is one way in which a large portion of the tax-paying community would be essentially relieved, and that is by the Government assuming the local war bounty debt incurred during the rebellion by the several States, counties, cities, and townships in the payment of bounties to volunteers.

These districts by reason of their exertions to promptly furnish their quotas for our armies, have incurred a great indebtedness, the payment of which now imposes a heavy and direct local tax which, in connection with other increased local tax and the direct taxes of the General Government, is felt throughout a great portion of our country as oppressive and burdensome, tending to depress commerce and industry, and thus weaken the resources of the Government, and as the people are manifesting uneasiness under such burden, and are expecting from Congress some relief, and under existing circumstances the only just and immediately available way to lighten the burden of our great debt is to increase the ability of the people to sustain it by relieving labor and stimulating industry. Such indebtedness of the cities, counties, and townships was the result of necessities imposed by the rebellion, and ought, therefore, as a matter of right and justice to be assumed by the Government and consolidated with the national debt, because being incurred by necessary and legitimate efforts to render prompt aid to sustain a common Government and defend a common country, it of right belongs to the general debt, in the payment of which the whole people should participate. Such consolidation would not increase the amount of general indebtedness resting upon the people as a result of the war, but simply bring together the parts into one whole, and lighten the burden by bringing more to contribute in just proportion to sustain it, and thus relieve the people from the oppressiveness resulting from its separate and local existence and direct bearing on a few; and as it is believed to be in the power of Congress to grant such relief, in a way equally just and fair to every section of our country, by adopting as a basis one year's service of a man in our armies, and allowing for such term of service a certain sum, and issuing national bonds therefore liable to taxation, which bonds may be paid over to each State in amount, and to be applied to the relief of the cities, counties, and townships in the State in proportion to the number of years' service rendered by the men furnished, and as the most productive and least burdensome taxes are levied exclusively by the national Government. With a view to strengthen the resources of the Government, by relieving the people from oppressive direct taxation and quickening trade and industry, and also with a view to promote the internal peace, unity, harmony and prosperity of the nation: It is the duty of Congress to assume this debt. A resolution was introduced by me in January last, of which the following is a copy:

"Resolved, That the subject of relieving, as far as practicable, the people of the different cities, counties and townships from the burden of a direct tax for their bounty war debt is deserving of our immediate and serious consideration, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of adopting such measures as will be proper and suitable to answer the demands of justice, and relieve the necessities of the people."

It was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and it is to be hoped that they will report a bill in accordance with the spirit of the resolution, and that it will meet the favorable consideration of this House. There is no good reason why the Government should not assume this debt, contracted as it was at a time when the immediate want of men to fill up our armies made the paying of local bounties a necessity, for by so doing men were sent forward promptly, and many a victory won by having in the field in season plenty of men to fill up the broken ranks: Scattered as this debt would be if assumed by the Government, all over the country, the burdens of it would fall very light on the tax-payer and bring great relief to the suffering many. It is the duty of Congress to make these burdens bear as lightly as possible and equally upon all. The following article that has come to my notice bearing upon this question I will read:

Local bounty debts and expenses.—What Congress can do to relieve the people.—The difference in the amounts of expenses incurred during the rebellion, by the several States, counties, townships, and cities, in the payment of bounties to volunteers, and the difference in the amounts of existing local debts resulting therefrom, have heretofore presented difficulties, seemingly insurmountable, to a proper adjustment of such expenses and debts among the several States and localities, with a view to their assumption by the General Government. But at length the attention of Congress has been called to a way by which, it appears, these difficulties may be surmounted, and in which the Government can assume and consolidate with the national debt such existing local debts, in a manner equally fair and just to every section of the country: an object much desired, because its consummation would bring to the people substantial relief from onerous taxation. That way has been suggested in a resolution recently offered by Mr. Hill, a Representative from New Jersey. The method of adjustment therein proposed is simple and practicable, and, as stated in the resolution, is to assume as a basis one year's service of a man in our armies, and for such term of service to allow a given sum, for which national bonds are to be issued, liable to taxation, and paid over to the States in amount, and to go to the relief of the different localities in proportion to the number of years' service rendered by the men furnished.

By a little careful reflection the justness and fairness of this method will become apparent. It will be perceived that by it an equal amount will be allowed, for an equal term of service, to every section of the country, whether the men furnished were procured by high bounties or low bounties or even no bounty; or whether the expenses thus incurred have been paid or in part paid or remain in the form of local debts; and that thereby the people everywhere will be placed upon a perfect equality as to a just liability to taxation under the consolidated debt. It will also appear that no matter what bounties were paid in different places, by this method the expenses thus incurred are equalized so far as they are assumed, and, therefore, that the people in one township are relieved from liability to be taxed for any excess in price of bounty paid in another. From the effects of its operation in the particulars as just stated, it is evident that this method of adjustment is calculated to fully meet and remove the most serious objections which hitherto have prevented action on this subject. Yet to the proposed consolidation of these debts there may exist in the minds of some this objection, that it would increase too greatly our already heavy public debt. That it would necessarily increase the amount of United States bonds to be issued is true; but it is also true that it would not increase the amount of general indebtedness now resting upon the people as a result of the war. Such indebtedness includes not only the United States bonds and circulating notes already issued, but also these local bounty debts, because all these forms of debt were the result of one united purpose—to sustain the same Government and defend the same country. Their weight now rests upon the people, and evidently would not be increased simply in a change of form by bringing all the parts together into one. But on the contrary a great benefit would result in the relief that would be given to the people from the onerous burden now unequally imposed and in the form of a direct tax for the payment of these local debts.

Upon due reflection it will readily appear that what is proposed to be done is simply this: in an equitable way to remove these local debts from the communities where they now exist, and where they bear oppressively—tending to check trade and industry—and place them in the national debt, where they will rest equally upon the people of the whole country, for whose benefit they were incurred. In their local form they rest upon a few, and are sustained by a direct tax only. In the national form they would rest upon the many, and be sustained mainly by indirect taxation, which is easier for the people; and therefore, by the change, although they would not be diminished, yet their pressure would be greatly lightened. The question may be asked, what will become of the funds that would be received under the working of this plan by those localities that have no bounty debt or whose debt is nearly paid? The effect would be that such communities would be left with funds in hand. Yet no injustice would be done, for these funds could be applied to the payment of future taxes, which would give the people equal relief. As a preliminary step to taking action upon this matter it will be necessary for Congress to ascertain from the several States the number of years' service rendered by each, and also the amount of such local indebtedness existing in each; then it can readily be determined what sum should be allowed for a year's service, and to what extent it will be practicable to assume those local debts. Such being the object of this measure, and such its manifest fairness and practicability, it is difficult to conceive of any reason why Congress should hesitate or delay to proceed at once to adopt the necessary measures to give the people the desired relief.

ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

The above fully accords with my view of the whole subject. The assuming of this debt by the Government does not, as some think, increase the public indebtedness, but simply changes it from local districts and States to the Government, and thereby places it in such shape that all parts of the country and all the States share equally in helping to pay it.

Mr. Chairman, another source of relief to our burdened tax-payers would be the modification of the tariff and the passage of a judicious discriminating bill protecting American labor and industry, which would create a revenue and give a healthful tone to the industrial interests of our country. Our manufacturing interests in many localities are prostrated; thousands of men have been thrown out of employment, and many more thousands dependent on them are almost without the necessities of life. The laboring interest of our country must be cared for. To this class of men are we, as a nation, most indebted for the present position we hold and enjoy, and no country thrives so well as that which protects and looks after the interests of the laboring classes. To make labor valuable, and have its rights upheld and protected, there must be a ready demand for it, and a ready demand is brought about only as all branches of industry are prospered and kept in successful operation.

The resources of our country are unlimited, abounding as we do in mineral wealth. Let these resources be brought out, our mines opened, forges, mills, and factories be built up, and thus plenty of labor will be found for all who desire work with good wages. Taxable property will be enhanced in value, and tax-paying inhabitants be multiplied. The revenue of the Government will be greatly increased, our public debt thereby reduced, and tax-payers generally be relieved. We all know that when our manufacturing interests are well protected, and in successful operation, then every other branch of business is successful. With our mines, forges, rolling-mills, factories, and machine-shops in full operation, with these thrive our agricultural interests. A ready market is created for the products our farmers may raise, with good prices for the same. Railroads and canals are wanted, and people, with plenty of work and good prices for their labor generally, have cash in hand and something saved for a dull day; can build themselves homes, and with their funds are enabled to patronize our railroads and canals. Thus the agricultural, railroad, and canal interests and all branches of industry are fostered and kept alive. Representing, as I do, a district that is identified with all these interests, I trust their wants will be regarded and adequate protection be granted to American labor and industry.

It is a well-known fact that our American manufacturers in many things are taking the lead of foreign manufacturers, and competing most favorably with them. We have seen it stated that when the war began—

"We could not make the iron for a gun-barrel; we can now export better gun-barrels than we can import. We then made no good steel, and had to rely on foreign countries for material for steel cannon and for those steel-pointed shot by which only we can pierce the five-and-a-half inch iron-clads with which we must contend in future warfare. Many of our regiments that came first to the capital came in rags, though every garment on their backs was new, and many of them of freshly imported cloth. But no army in the world was ever so substantially clothed and armed as was that which for two days passed in review before the President of the United States and the Lieutenant General after having conquered the rebellion, and which, when disbanded, was clad in the product of American spindles and looms, and armed with weapons of American materials and construction."

These facts alone should create a national pride among our people, and should stir up

Congress to do all in their power to foster and sustain our own American interests. Especially should we look after and see to it that the laboring interests of the country are protected, and not brought down to a level with the cheap labor of Europe.

The laboring classes of this country during our late war rendered valuable assistance. Hundreds of thousands of them, as call after call was made for men, sprang to arms to help defend us in the great struggle for the life of the nation, leaving good situations, and a large portion of them without bounties, but simply getting the small sum of thirteen and sixteen dollars a month for their patriotic services, and to them the country is indebted for the success of our arms in upholding our flag and breaking up the rebellion. I have seen whole companies, sir, from our mining regions tender themselves to our Governor at the capital of our State, and so thick and fast did they come in that many of them he was obliged to refuse and send back to their homes, which they went to very reluctantly, so intent were they to go forth to defend our common country, and afterward enlisted and went forth to the battle. And these, Mr. Chairman, and hundreds of thousands more, with all our laboring men in this country, we ask at the hands of Congress, may be protected. Living, as I do, in the midst of a large community of workingmen, and representing a district so largely made up of this class of citizens, honest, intelligent, and industrious, so long as I serve them I shall feel it my duty to look after their interests and see that they are respected. As in the past, so in the future my vote shall be given for such measures as shall best secure for them all their rights and proper protection. Let suitable protection be granted. The resources of our country would thereby be developed, and it would not be many years before our revenue would be largely increased, and our public debt reduced and paid.

The limited time afforded me forbids my saying anything further on this vastly important subject. I trust action will be had at once on this question, or if it cannot be reached at this session will be among the first to be taken up at the next meeting of Congress.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that it is our duty also to curtail the expenses of the Government. Speeches on economy and resolutions are not enough. Every unnecessary officer about the Capitol and the Departments should be cut off, and members of Congress themselves should set the example. The franking privilege should be, to a certain extent, modified and regulated that it be not so much abused, and thereby hundreds of thousands of dollars be saved to the Government. We are paying now, and have been for the last fifteen or twenty years, $700,000 per annum for free postage, and with proper restrictions on the franking privilege at least one half of this sum would be saved. Car loads of books are transmitted through the mails free, and in many instances are sold at the same price per pound as old rags. We know of an ex-member of Congress who had cart loads of public documents carried through the mails, and afterward sold for three cents per pound, the price of waste paper and rags, after having cost the Government a large sum for carrying them in the mails, for clerk hire, in handling them, and for bags, boxes, &c., to send them in. The restriction of the franking privilege would naturally stop the printing of many public documents which are worthless, and in that way hundreds of thousands of dollars be saved to the Government. I hope this matter will receive the earnest attention of Congress.

I have for some time been looking for an opportunity to introduce a resolution restricting the franking privilege, and now give notice that I shall at a proper time introduce a resolution bearing upon this subject.

The mileage allowed to members of Congress is a matter that ought to cease. When first adopted it was at a time when it was very difficult to travel and get through the country. That evil is now remedied. The capital is very accessible from all parts of the Union. The salary of members has been increased, and the necessity for payment of mileage does not now exist. By cutting off the mileage many thousands of dollars would be saved. I trust at an early day some action will be taken in regard to this matter. More care should be exercised on the part of the Government in making of contracts, and thus thousands of dollars saved yearly.

Mr. Chairman, I have glanced hurriedly at a few of the retrenchments which I think ought to be brought about. The country demands it, the burdened tax-payer demands it, and as the Representative of a district composed largely of men who earn their bread by hard labor and toil, and who feel the heavy burden of taxation, I ask that they be relieved by adopting the retrenchments alluded to above. I admit that much has been done in curtailing expenses; and congratulate the members of this House that they have been able to effect so much, amounting to a reduction of expenses the current year of about sixty million dollars, but there is still room for more reductions. I have, sir, voted uniformly against all measures that called for additional expenses, or what I considered unnecessary appropriations at this present time. For this reason, I voted against the Alaska bill, for while it may be a good purchase for the Government, yet I did not feel that it was a proper time, while we are so heavily in debt, to pay out of the Treasury over seven millions in gold. I, sir, sympathize with my constituents, who I know from the many letters I receive are burdened with heavy taxes, and ask for all the economy that is possible in carrying on the Government—the same rigid economy they have to exercise at home; and while I represent them shall vote against every measure that contemplates unnecessarily the taking of money from the public Treasury. I believe, sir, strict economy, retrenchment, and curtailing expenses, whenever we can, should be one of the great efforts of Congress, and if careful in expenditures in all departments of Government, with the vast resources of our country to be developed, it will not be many years before we shall be out of debt, and free from the embarrassments and heavy taxes that now burden the people.

Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. ANDERSON, OF MISSOURI.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 16, 1868.

The House having under consideration the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, from the ninth congressional district of Missouri—

Mr. ANDERSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise for the purpose of replying to some things said by the contestant; but, before doing so, I wish to allude to a remark which has been made by the chairman of the Committee of Elections of this House. That gentleman [Mr. DAWES] stated to the House that he had asked me in the committee if I had any charges of disloyalty to make against the contestant, and I replied that I had not. With proper deference to what the gentleman has said, I must say that I have no recollection whatever of any such conversation. I know that in the record of the case, as made up, the question of the loyalty of the contestant was not raised, and it could go before the committee only as it was presented by my colleague [Mr. BENJAMIN] in the argument. I presume the House of Representatives will not fail to take cognizance of a direct charge of disloyalty made against the contestant upon this floor by a member of this body.

Sir, I feel a deep interest in this case. The loyal men of Missouri feel a deep interest in its decision, and their interests are vastly greater than mine. The contestant talks about his "honor," and he speaks fluently of what he would not do and what he would do. Sir, I say to the House this day, (and no man knows the fact better than the contestant himself,) that with a fair and proper registration in the county of Callaway I would have received a majority of all the votes cast in our congressional district. No man in Missouri knows better than he does that the law was most infamously and outrageously violated in the county of Callaway, and no man contributed to that violation more than the contestant himself by his course toward the registering officers in public speeches in that county.

Peculiar efforts were made to induce the rebel element of that county to cast a large vote, the rebel sentiment being overwhelming there. Frank Blair, the present candidate of the Democracy for Vice President, was imported into that county, as the testimony shows, and he made a speech pretty much in keeping with the letter he has lately written about the reconstruction laws of Congress. I want to read the testimony in reference to the speech made by this gentleman, and show how it corresponds with the advice he has given the people of the nation in reference to the laws that have been passed by Congress.

Here is the testimony of William H. Burnham, a friend of the contestant, and a member of his party:

"Question. Where do you reside?

"Answer. In Fulton, Callaway county, Missouri.

"Question. How long have you resided in Callaway county?

"Answer. If I mistake not, it will be four years next August.

"Question. Are you well acquainted with the provisions of the third section of the constitution of Missouri?

"Answer. I may safely say that I am acquainted with it.

"Question. Were not the people of this county advised to take the oath imposed by the constitution, upon the ground that this provision of the constitution was unconstitutional, and the State had no right to impose that oath on the voter?

"Answer. I did hear the people so advised by Mr. Frank P. Blair, of St. Louis."

The speech of General Blair was made to arouse a spirit of resistance to the law in that county. The character of the speech shows that extraordinary efforts were to be made in this county to poll votes in violation of the constitution and laws of Missouri, in order to secure the election of the contestant. Sir, if these men were excluded from the polls who ought to be excluded by the constitution and laws of the State of Missouri, this contestant would not have the least ground to stand upon. If I believed under a proper registration of Callaway Mr. Switzler would have beaten me for Congress I would never have accepted a certificate of election.

The gentleman says that he was appointed provost marshal by Mr. Lincoln. That is true; but when charges of disloyalty were filed against the gentleman he was removed, because he was an unfit man to hold that office. When he was provost marshal of this district he had a good deal of trouble with the county of Callaway; and I have the testimony of his chief clerk, giving the opinions of the contestant in regard to the loyalty of this county, where there was a registered vote of two thousand:

"WILLIAM W. DAVENPORT, of lawful age, on his oath, depose and saith:

"Question. Mr. Davenport, where do you reside?

"Answer. Mexico, Audrain county, Missouri.

"Question. How long have you resided in this congressional district?

"Answer. Upward of twenty years.

"Question. Were you connected in any manner with the service of the Government during the war?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. What service were you connected with?

"Answer. With the conscription bureau, for upward of two years, from some time in the latter part of August, 1863, to the 1st of September, 1865.

HO. OF REPS.

Contested Election—Mr. Anderson.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

"Question. What district was that conscription bureau for?"

"Answer. Ninth congressional district. I also hold the rank of deputy provost marshal.

"Question. Were you thoroughly conversant with the operations of the board?"

"Answer. I was, sir. I had entire charge of the records and correspondence.

"Question. Who was provost marshal of the district?"

"Answer. Colonel Switzler, and then Lovelace, and then Adams, who was president of the board, by virtue of his office of provost marshal.

"Question. While William F. Switzler, the contestant in this case, was president of the board, was there much difficulty in executing the conscript law in this county—Callaway?"

"Answer. There was, sir; the enrolling officers had to be furnished with heavy guards while performing their duties—being afraid to go out of town without them.

"Question. Did Colonel Switzler furnish to the provost marshal general any excuse for not enrolling the county of Callaway in time? and if so, what?"

"Answer. He did, letters reprimanding him for his tardiness in enrolling the district were received by him, both by the provost marshal general of this State, and the Provost Marshal General of the United States; he gave as his reason the condition of the county in which the officer had to operate. This county was about the last in the district in which the enrollment was finished, the reason for which was, as stated by him to the provost marshal general, that he could not obtain suitable escorts to accompany the enrolling officers.

"Question. Have you any knowledge of a communication while he was president of the board to the provost marshal general, in which he expressed an opinion as to the loyalty or disloyalty of the people of Callaway county?"

"Answer. My recollection is, that in one of his communications to the provost marshal general in regard to the dilatoriness in enrolling this county, he expressed the opinion that there were not two hundred loyal men in it.

"Question. What other means did you have of knowing his opinion of the loyalty of the county?"

"Answer. He was very much annoyed with the slow progress of the enrollment; frequently expressed himself in regard to it; frequently designating it as the South Carolina of Missouri. I repeatedly heard him say there were not two hundred loyal men in it, in his opinion.

"Question. What would be your opinion, with your means of knowing, as to the number of qualified voters in Callaway county, under a proper execution of the registry law?"

"Answer. I have no means of knowing, except information received while connected with the provost marshal's bureau. I thoroughly coincided with Colonel Switzler in his estimates as to the number of loyal men in the county then, and have had no reason to change my opinion since.

"W. W. DAVENPORT."

We see here, then, when he was occupying office and wearing the shoulder-straps Mr. Lincoln had put upon him, he thought there were but two hundred loyal men in the county of Callaway. When he expressed this opinion he was acting in an official capacity. To excuse himself for the slow progress of the enrollment he cited the rebellious condition of sweet Callaway, and characterized the county as the South Carolina of Missouri. To-day, if the contestant was placed on oath I cannot believe that he would fail to testify that the registry law was most shamefully violated in this county. Witnesses who had resided in the county twenty-five and thirty years testified without exception, that there were not over two hundred Union men in this county, backing up the official declaration of the contestant made before he thought of becoming the candidate of the rebels for Congress.

Now, sir, I say to this House that the indorsement of this registration in Callaway county is equivalent to saying to the rebels of that county or any other county in Missouri, "If you will intimidate and browbeat the registering officers and get yourselves placed on the registry list, the Congress of the United States will recognize the validity of the registration, and you will have no sort of trouble about it." The indorsement of the registration is saying to the rebels of Missouri where they have the preponderance, as in Callaway county, "Trample under foot the laws of the State; you are all right with the Congress of the United States. All you have got to do is to swear and to vote." This was the advice given to these men throughout the county, and pending the registration there was a meeting of confederate soldiers in that county with a view to influencing the election, but finding the registrars were placing every man on the list who choose to take the oath, they adjourned without passing any resolution on the subject. Their end had been accomplished. They had intended to hold a meeting, but the ends and aims of the gentleman and his party were carried out in a complete nullification of the registry law in that county.

Now, go back with me to 1862. In August, 1862, the people of Missouri were called upon to enroll in the militia of the State. The county of Callaway did not pay any regard to this whatever. The testimony of Hiram Cornell shows that they did not pretend to organize under that call of the Governor of the State. It was December of that year before any attempt was made by the people of that county to organize. And how many men were found in that county in December, 1862, who were willing to do even militia service for the State of Missouri on the loyal side? There were but three companies that could be raised. Two of them were rejected on account of having elected disloyal officers, and only one company was mustered into the service. But when it came to voting over two thousand were registered as qualified voters where but one company of loyal men could be found to do service in behalf of the Government. In other words, when in 1862 the people of Callaway were asked to do the duties of loyalty they did not respond, but in 1866 they were clamorous to exercise the privileges of loyalty, and over two thousand men were found who swore they had always been loyal to the Government. The proper doctrine to teach is that he who will not perform the duties of loyalty shall not exercise its privileges.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised, indeed, to hear the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, who made this report from the Committee of Elections, say to the House that the registration officers were all my friends. Sir, I had not three political friends among the registrars of that county, and they all swear that the law was most infamously violated.

Mr. POLAND. I beg to correct the gentleman. What I did say was this: that so far as there was any evidence whatever in the case in relation to the political sentiments of these registrars, they were the political friends of the sitting member, that the superintendent of registration was appointed by the Governor, who was his political friend; and that there was no evidence to show that any single one of the district registrars was not his political friend. I say the same now.

Mr. ANDERSON. The truth in reference to the registering officers is that of the nine appointed but three were my political friends. Why? Because, as William H. Thomas testifies, he could not find men that were loyal to the Government in that country who would execute the registry law. There are whole townships in that county in which I did not receive a solitary vote. And why? Because those men had been imbued with the spirit of rebellion and not a political friend of mine could be obtained in some townships in the county to execute the registry law. Such was the condition of things in that county, and out of a registered vote of nearly two thousand one hundred, but forty-five votes were rejected in the entire county.

Mr. POLAND. I beg to correct the gentleman from Missouri in what he says in reference to the testimony of Thomas. Thomas certifies, in this certificate which he undertook to foist upon the copy of registration, that he was unable to find suitable men, and therefore appointed improper and unsuitable men. He does not testify to any such fact.

Mr. ANDERSON. Here is the testimony of Thomas, on page 20:

"Question. Were you present at the registration of voters at any time in the township of Fulton?"

"Answer. For some time previous to the registration in Fulton township I had been endeavoring to get various men whom I thought would carry out the law in Fulton township. I found it difficult to do so. As a final resort, I appointed Mr. J. D. Snedcor, who had acted as provost marshal for the county, who I thought had a better chance to do the work legally than any other man I could get. I went into his office soon after he commenced and saw him register a number of persons."

Now, after looking around for a good man to register in Fulton township, where nearly one fourth of the entire vote of the county was registered, he alighted on this man Snedcor; and Jesse Garner in his testimony swears that he told Snedcor when he registered that he had been in the rebel service, and had been wounded in it; and notwithstanding that Snedcor enrolled him as a qualified voter and put him on the list as such. This is the only man Thomas could find who would execute the registry law or promise to execute it in that township. He rejected few of those who applied and did not reject a solitary man who would come forward and take the oath. What did the law require the registering officers to do? It required them to diligently inquire into the loyalty of these men. Thomas swears that he furnished to the registering officers a list of those enrolled as disloyal men in the county. That list foots up some five hundred, and yet notwithstanding they were furnished with that list and the law required them to inquire diligently into the loyalty of those men they were registered as qualified voters. That is the manner in which the law was executed in that county.

Sir, I am perfectly satisfied that the law was most infamously violated in that county. I am equally well satisfied that the contestant himself knows that if there had been a proper registration I should have beaten him for Congress; and I know full well that in the coming contest in that district the gentleman will find himself in the vocative if he relies upon a repetition of the Callaway registration; for I tell you that the law will then be executed in that county, or some of the gentlemen's friends will be executed. [Laughter.] There is no solitary witness who has been called upon to give his opinion of the number of Union men in the county that has set it at over two hundred and eighty persons. It would have required a legal registration of five hundred and eighteen votes in the county of Callaway to have defeated me for Congress.

Who believes that there was any attention paid to the execution of the law with such a state of facts as this, shown by the testimony, and staring the House of Representatives in the face?

Mr. Speaker, I was pained to hear the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] make the remarks he did in reference to the supervisor of registration of the county of Callaway. Sir, there is nothing which will better satisfy rebel malignity and rebel hatred than to find upon the floor of this House of Representatives a Republican member of the Committee of Elections denouncing William H. Thomas. That man has stood out against the traitors of Callaway county, and tried honestly and faithfully to execute the law. There is no more honest man, no better, no more faithful citizen, than William H. Thomas; and there is nothing that the rebel element of Missouri, and especially of this county of Callaway, will delight in more than to read the comments of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] upon what he calls this fly-blown registry of William H. Thomas. Sir, William H. Thomas is a true and loyal man, and there is not a man of intelligence in Missouri of any political party who does not know that William H. Thomas certified to the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, when he certified that the registry law had not been carried out in its letter and spirit in the county of Callaway. Sir, the law was shamefully violated, and it would have been better for the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Poland] to leave the abuse of this faithful officer to the malignant traitors of Callaway county whose efforts to trample our laws under foot he has done so much to defeat.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The contestant has alluded to his indorsement by General Dodge. General Dodge indorses the contestant's estimate of the number of Union men in Callaway county, and has stated to me over and over again in this House that there were not two hundred loyal men in the county of Callaway, and there is no man who ever commanded that department who will not justify that declaration, a declaration made by the contestant himself.

Now, as to the charges of disloyalty preferred by my colleague [Mr. Benjamin] against the contestant, as also the like charge made by the contestant against myself. The contestant, in order to defend himself against the charge of disloyalty preferred against him by a member of this House, turns about and says that if he has a bad record I have one equally bad.

"Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung."

William F. Switzler, in 1861, published these articles sent up to the Clerk's desk and read, and he dare not deny them. In 1860, 1861, 1862 I was a pro-slavery man. I did not agree with Mr. Lincoln when he issued his emancipation proclamation, but I did not intend to separate myself from the Union men of the county. I accepted that proclamation in good faith. I was the owner of some slave property, and the moment I accepted that proclamation I emancipated every slave I owned, and I did not reserve them for the purpose of presenting a claim for them. Sir, I state upon the floor of the House of Representatives that I was the first man in North Missouri that raised an armed organization against the rebellion. I was the first man to whom arms were furnished for the purpose of suppressing traitors. I had them in the service when the gentleman was writing articles against the country, and glorying over the death of its gallant officers. Yes, sir, while I was raising and arming men to put down the rebellion the contestant was writing an article for his paper glorifying the rebel Jackson for shooting down the gallant Ellsworth—glorizing over the fact that a traitor's hand had been bathed in the blood of a brave Union officer. This is the man who tells this House that he has always followed the brave old flag.

The gentleman has not pretended to controvert the charges that have been made here by my colleague on this floor, who, as a Representative in this body, has a right to prefer these charges. And the gentleman need not tell the House, after the extraordinary exhibition he has made, that he was unprepared for this charge. The charge of disloyalty was made in the committee-room, and he has been so careful, in order to get an indorsement here and there, by somebody who was loyal to the Government, that he has procured a letter written by a Wisconsin soldier to a member of Congress, to show that he gave the soldier something to eat when he was sick.

Replying to the charge of the gentleman that I have not been loyal to the Government, I will say, that from the beginning to the close of the late war I have had the unlimited confidence of the Union men of my State, especially of my district, senatorial and congressional. In 1862 I was indorsed by the people of my senatorial district as a Union emancipation candidate. In 1864 I was elected to Congress. In 1866 I was reelected, and nobody knows it better than the gentleman himself, because he is just as well aware of the frauds perpetrated in the county of Callaway as any man can possibly be.

I do not plead in this case for myself. What I have to say is in support of those laws which have been the sheet-anchor of the loyal men of Missouri. We have passed through some terrific struggles in that State. We have had some bold, bad men to deal with. And to-day one of the boldest men in that State is upon the Democratic presidential ticket a candidate for the Vice Presidency. At the last election he went through my State denouncing the laws and telling the people to put their foot upon them, and to vote anyhow. He is now elevated to the dignity of Democratic nominee for Vice President and has written a letter pledging himself to wipe out the reconstruction laws of Congress.

Under the lead of that man there will be a desperate struggle in Missouri, and these men will again attempt to override and trample under foot the laws of my State. I say to this Congress, be careful how you add fuel to this flame. Be careful how you uphold, support, and sustain the rebel element in Missouri in this infraction and violation of our laws. The Union men of that State have had their trials and difficulties; but thank God, we have passed through them safely, and hope to do so again. But let it not be said that an American Congress, composed three fourths of Republicans, have indorsed the infamous violation of laws on the part of the rebels and traitors of Callaway county. Let me not go back to my people and say to the Union men there, "You have been stabbed in the house of your friends." I do not want to do it. I do not want a Congress of Republicans to give their indorsement upon a system which says to every traitor in Missouri, "You can violate our constitution and laws, and if you once can get yourself registered, if you can swear that you are sound you can get through perfectly safe as far as the American Congress is concerned."

Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House as long as I desired, and I am now willing to leave the question to its decision.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. BROOMALL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 15, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BROOMALL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Four years ago the political party which has just fixed upon its candidates and laid down its principles at New York entered the contest for the Presidency by declaring the war in which we were then engaged a wrong and a failure, and with singular inconsistency placed at the head of its ticket a man who had gained all the celebrity he had in the prosecution of that war. It was not without good cause that the people refused to trust such a candidate accepting nomination by such a party upon such a platform. The men who had fought upon a hundred battle-fields could not consent that their well-earned fame had been won in an unholy or a failing cause, and it was not to be expected that they would accept as a civil leader one even of their own number who would denounce his own deeds. Few voters at that election had not some one who had given his life for his country upon some battle-field to be remembered at the same time with pride and sorrow, a son, a brother, a friend; and it was too much to ask of the voters to admit through the ballot-box that that some one died in an unholy cause, died in the act of murder, a felon and not a patriot. The result of that election justified the war and hallowed the graves of the dead.

A few months settled the question of success, though the same denunciation of the cause of the country, and the same prophecy of failure in which "the wish was father to the thought," continued and blended themselves with the very shouts of victory. But the fact of success had at last to be admitted. The rebels had laid down their arms. There was no enemy in the field. It was then due to the country that these gentlemen should at least confess their error; that having blundered so fearfully upon the question of success, they should now admit the justice of the cause in which so many lives were sacrificed and so much treasure expended. But they have not the grace to do this. True to their old instincts of love for the enemies of the country, ever since the surrender they have espoused the cause of the vanquished and have conspired with them to gain by political management what was lost in the field. They were not satisfied with the terms granted by the victors, though those terms were more lenient than were ever before extended to a fallen foe in any country since the dawn of history. A stranger to the events of the last eight years, listening to a Democratic speech here or elsewhere, would suppose all the justice, as well as all the valor had been upon the side of the lost cause.

Yet these people, with all their predilections in favor of the enemy, are asking that the Government of the country should be intrusted to them. Was ever effrontery more glaring? What possible claim have they to public confidence? In 1860, when the destinies of the Republic were in their hands, they professed to know no legal means to sustain the Government against an internal enemy. Their President thought that though it might be treason to conspire to overthrow the Government yet it was equally treason to prevent the overthrow by force. His very Cabinet, while drawing their salaries from the public Treasury, plotted to dismember the country. Their Vice President and their candidate for the succession exercised his high office in the interests of the enemy, and left it to head their armies. With some honorable exceptions every Democratic officer of the Government joined the ranks of the rebels after doing all the damage to the country he could and dared while in power. And yet this party, without denouncing the crimes of its leaders in 1860, asks again to be intrusted with the destinies of the country! It is difficult to decide whether more to admire or to condemn the impudence of such a demand.

We sometimes speak of the outbreak which has recently yielded to our victorious arms as a rebellion of the South, a slaveholders' rebellion. This is a misnomer. Impartial history will write it down as a rebellion of the Democratic party—will say that this party, defeated at an election by honest votes, refused to submit, and appealed from the ballot-box to the sword. Impartial history will record that every prominent leader of the rebellion was a Democrat; that every northern man who favored or sympathized with the rebellion was a Democrat. Impartial history will record that the entire Democratic organization of the country was managed in the interests of the enemy. Every member of Congress who remained in that organization cast his votes during the whole terrible struggle as if they had been dictated by Jefferson Davis, and at every election in the North the contest was plainly and manifestly for or against the country.

It may be asked why the rebellion did not succeed since the Democratic party was in the majority prior to the outbreak? The answer is easy. The masses of that party in the North refused to follow their leaders. Their patriotism proved stronger than their party ties, and when the life of the nation was threatened they forgot that they were Democrats and only remembered that they were American citizens. They took arms for the defense of their country against their party. We owe these men a debt of gratitude which can never be forgotten. If the masses of the Democratic party in the North had been as faithless as their leaders the flag of the country would never have reappeared upon Fort Sumter.

And yet this organization asks again to be intrusted with the reins of Government? Has it changed its principles since eight years ago, when it believed the rebellion had a constitutional right to succeed? or since four years ago, when it denounced the attempt to uphold the Government by force as a wrong and a failure? There is nothing in the Constitution or the doings of the recent convention in New York indicating such change. Look for a moment at its constituent elements. Almost every delegate from the South was an active participant in the attempt to overthrow the Government. The notorious Forrest, the infamous murderer of the Fort Pillow prisoners, was there, and was fêted and flattered by his obsequious northern admirers. Wade Hampton was there, Stephens, the vice president of the late "confederacy," was there as an outside manager. His written sentiments were humbly received and respectfully submitted to the appropriate committee, to enter into the platform of the party. Almost every northern delegate was a sympathizer with the rebellion during its continuance and an honest mourner for "the lost cause." Members of Congress, who could boast that they never voted a man or a dollar to the cause of the country, were there. Seymour was there, who, as Governor of New York, thought that a mob had as good right to invoke the law of necessity as the Government of his country, and who, after thus stimulating resistance to the draft, called the ruffian hordes who acted upon his hint his friends. My colleague from the Luzerne district, who, in 1861, thought slavery "an institution divinely sanctioned if not divinely ordained," was there.

These gentlemen were a fair sample of the elements of that delectable body, and it may be well said that there was nothing in those elements to inspire the sober, thinking people of the United States with respect or confidence. It was the first national convention of the rebels and their northern friends since the beginning of the war, and the occasion was made peculiarly jubilant. The parable of the returning prodigal was somewhat changed. It was not the son coming home repentant, and asking only to occupy the meanest position in the household, but claiming rights, demanding the chief place at the family altar, and proposing condescendingly to forgive the father.

During the war these gentlemen were debarred the privileges of friendly consultation by the interference of armed forces. In 1864 the southern wing of the Democratic party could only pray for the election of McClellan, and prayers, as the result showed, were not as efficacious in such a cause as votes might have been. If the adherents of Jefferson Davis could have voted in 1864, the life of Lincoln might have been spared, and the country might have been saved from the disgrace of being ruled by his successor. But on the other hand the result would have been precisely as if Grant had surrendered to Lee at Richmond; and that result will be brought about in 1868, if under the decrees of an inscrutable Providence it were possible for the nominees of the New York convention to succeed in the coming election.

What a sublime instance of chivalric condescension it was in these gentlemen to admit, as they do in their platform, that they "stand upon the Constitution as the foundation and limitation of the powers of the Government and the guarantee of the liberties of the citizen," and that they "recognize the questions of slavery and secession as having been settled for all time to come by the war." It must have gone hard with these gentlemen to achieve that pinnacle of human virtue upon which they could thus acknowledge that they had been beaten. After taking this bitter pill, no wonder they should find it salutary and necessary to "demand immediate restoration of all the States to their rights in the Union," and "amnesty for all past political offenses."

But what does the Democratic party propose to do in the event of their restoration to power? We have their word, at least by implication, that they will not reestablish the institution of slavery. Once, according to their teaching, it was the very bulwark of American liberty; it was the only sacred constituent of our national structure; the only thing which a majority of the people, acting in a legal and constitutional manner, dared not lay their hands upon. Now they consent to its abolition. They admit, at least apparently, that the country can survive its downfall.

We have also their word, at least by implication, that they will not again resort to secession as a remedy for a lost election. Once it was an important principle of their creed that any State might at will withdraw from her allegiance to the Union. Now they admit, or seem to admit, that the war, which in 1864 was a failure, at least has destroyed this right, and that now, at least, the Republic of America is a nation, and not a mere voluntary association of independent and sovereign States. Upon these questions they seem to have adopted the principles of the Republican party. This is hopeful. After a few more beatings at the ballot-box, if not in the field, they may become thorough converts to the cause of human progress.

It will not do, however, to count too confidently upon their conversion. A more full examination of their platform discloses a little of the old spirit of their leaders in 1861. What do they mean by saying that they "regard the reconstruction acts (so called) of Congress as usurpations, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void?" Now, a void act of Congress, an unconstitutional act of Congress, is no act of Congress at all, and the statute books of the nation remain precisely as if no such act of Congress had ever been passed. Yet, under the reconstruction acts, six Senators hold their seats at the other end of the Capitol, and four more are ready to be sworn in. Under these acts the Representatives from North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida now vote daily in this body upon important questions touching the government of the country, and the Representatives from Louisiana and Alabama are awaiting and will be allowed admission within three days. Long before the country will decide between the rival candidates for the Presidency ten States will be regularly organized and in successful operation under the reconstruction acts.

What does the Democracy propose to do with these States? If the reconstruction acts are unconstitutional, these States are not States at all, and their Senators and Representatives are not Senators and Representatives, but mere imposters. Before any remedy can be applied these States will be in operation at least until March 4, 1869. Their Legislatures will have enacted laws affecting for good or ill the lives and property of their citizens. Their courts will have adjudicated causes, perhaps will have condemned and executed criminals. Upon the Democratic hypothesis all these things will be null and void, and every State judge who sentences a murderer to death, every sheriff who hangs him, will be himself a murderer. Besides this, every act of Congress passed by the votes of these Senators and Representatives will be null and void, and what is and what is not United States law will puzzle the shrewdest lawyer in Christendom.

Now, what does the Democracy propose to do? They have solemnly adopted a theory which leads unavoidably to these monstrous results which unsettles questions of life and property for millions of human beings. What do they propose to do? To say nothing about the evils which will have been inflicted long before they can possibly come into power, what do they propose to do for the future?

Let these void States stand? Let these impostors, these false Senators and Representatives occupy the halls of legislation, affecting the interest of the entire country for good or ill by their votes? This would be too inconsistent for even the Democratic party. But what would they do? Repeat the reconstruction laws, and throw everything in the South again into chaos and anarchy? Monstrous as this would be in its consequences they could not do it. Grant that they could gain the Presidency. Grant that they could elect a majority of the members of the Forty-First Congress. Yet the Senate could not, by any possibility, be changed for years to come. And it requires both Houses of Congress to repeal a law. What then? Would they invoke the aid of the Supreme Court and get the acts declared void? This might possibly have done before the organization and recognition of the States under those acts, but it is too late for this even now. The Supreme Court has already decided in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that whether a given political organization is or is not a State is a political question with which that Court has nothing to do; that the recognition of a given organization as a State by Congress, by the admission of its Senators and Representatives, settles the question finally and forever for all departments of the Government. How, then, will the Democratic party right this alleged wrong? The platform is not very explicit upon this point. It points out the grievance, and imposes upon the party the necessity of applying some remedy. Now, there are but two modes conceivable; one is by civil process, and the other by revolution; one by law, and the other by war. I have shown that the civil, the legal mode is in the nature of things impossible. This the Democracy must have known. The inference is, therefore, that they intend to resort to arms.

But we are not left to inference alone upon this question. Among the candidates for the second position upon the ticket was a late major general of the Union armies. This gentleman had done due penance for his sin of supporting his Government against the Democratic party. With praiseworthy condescension his late enemies in the hostile field agreed to accept him as their Vice President. Before his nomination he wrote a letter to the convention, in which he denounced the reconstruction acts of Congress as unconstitutional and void, and declared the States organized under them to be without legal authority or existence. He recognized the fact and deplored it, that there was no peaceable and legal mode of overthrowing them, and therefore he declared it to be the duty of the proposed Democratic President immediately upon his inauguration to organize an army, march it into the South, and disperse those illegal and void State governments at the point of the bayonet!

But let the letter speak for itself, that there may be no misunderstanding. Here it is:

WASHINGTON, June 23, 1868.

DEAR COLONEL: In reply to your inquiries, I beg leave to say that I leave to you to determine, on consultation with my friends from Missouri, whether my name shall be presented to the Democratic convention, and to submit the following as what I consider the real and only issue in this contest:

The reconstruction policy of the Radicals will be complete before the next election: the States so long excluded will have been admitted; negro suffrage established, and the carpet-baggers installed in their seats in both branches of Congress. There is no possibility of changing the political character of the Senate, even if the Democrats should elect their President and a majority of the popular branch of Congress. We cannot, therefore, undo the Radical plan of reconstruction by congressional action; the Senate will continue a bar to its repeal. Must we submit to it? How can it be overthrown? It can only be overthrown by the authority of the Executive, who is sworn to maintain the Constitution, and who will fail to do his duty if he allows the Constitution to perish under a series of congressional enactments which are in palpable violation of its fundamental principles.

If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives will control both branches of Congress, and his Administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson.

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution. It will not be able to withstand the public judgment, if distinctly invoked and clearly expressed on this fundamental issue, and it is the sure way to avoid all future strife to put the issue plainly to the country.

I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us. Shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit. What can a Democratic President do in regard to any of these, with a Congress in both branches controlled by the carpet-baggers and their allies? He will be powerless to stop the supplies by which idle negroes are organized into political clubs; by which an army is maintained to protect these vagabonds in their outrages upon the ballot. These, and things like these, eat up the revenue and resources of the Government and destroy its credit—make the difference between gold and greenbacks. We must restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances, and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpation of Congress, known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle.

Your friend,

FRANK P. BLAIR.

Colonel JAMES O. BROADHEAD.

This letter secured General Frank P. Blair the votes of the rebels and the second place on their ticket. Did it express the views and purposes of the convention? There might have been some doubt upon this point if it had been written after the nomination. But it was written before, and was read to the delegates before they voted. Hence by their action they indorsed its sentiments and made it a part of their platform. Was the letter written in a spirit of bravado? Possibly so. Was it a mere bid for the position? Possibly so. But those who know General Blair would think this very improbable. Certainly it was received and indorsed by the convention in good faith and sober earnest.

We are therefore threatened with war in the event of the success of the New York nominees in the coming election. Let us beware how we disregard the threat. Let us learn wisdom from the past. Let us remember that when the Democratic party threatened war in 1860 they meant it, and they followed it up to the filling of many a soldier's grave and the grief of many a northern household. The South may have had enough of war, but the northern Democracy is still belligerent. It has never yet surrendered. What a pity it is for the good of the country that under the law of nations General Lee had no power to capitulate for his allies upon his defeat, and so to surrender the entire Democratic party, North as well as South, as prisoners of war.

General Grant, in his letter of acceptance of the Republican nomination, says in short, strong, and impressive language, such as he always uses, "Let us have peace." The Democratic platform proposes to do what can only be done by revolution; and its second candidate calls in so many words for war. Is the country ready for the question? Ask the soldiers, in whose memories the long and weary march and the awful carnage of close conflict are still fresh. Ask the mothers of fair, brave boys just approaching manhood. Ask the fathers of maimed and mutilated sons. Ask the toiling millions ground down already by debt and taxation. Is the country ready for the question? It will be upon us in November; and if we are disposed to treat it lightly let us bear in mind that when the Democratic party threatened war in 1860 it meant it.

Let it be understood that the clearest and best defined issue between the two great parties of the country is this one of peace or war; whether the southern States shall be maintained as their citizens have constituted them under the reconstruction acts, by peaceful and legal means, or, on the other hand, overturned by Federal bayonets and replaced by war and anarchy. There are other issues very important, but less clearly set out. Something in the New York platform looks fearfully like repudiation of the debt of the Government, fearfully like sapping the faith of the nation, which ought to be as dear to the heart of every patriot as the very life of the nation. But ingenious sophistry may possibly explain this away. However that may be, one thing may be said with safety and certainty. The public credit will be brighter and purer under the party which incurred the debt in defense of the country than under the party whose rebellion the debt was incurred to crush.

But the issue of peace or war stands boldly out. It is not attempted to be denied or even concealed. If there is faith in human promises, if there is consistency in human actions, then the election of Grant will continue the rule of law and order, will maintain the southern States as they are and restore their former prosperity and greatness, while the election of Seymour will destroy those States by the sword and inaugurate civil war, in which this time the United States will be the aggressor.

Let us now suppose General Frank P. Blair to be in error; let us suppose there is some peaceable and legal means of destroying the State governments of the South, is there any reason why they should be destroyed? They are republican in form. They are precisely what a majority of the legal voters in those States have made them, and they have been acknowledged as States of the Union by the Government of the United States. If the Constitution even gave us the right to interfere with them why should we do so? The New York platform implies, rather than expresses, the Democratic reason. It is because some of the legal voters in those States are black. Is that sufficient? Some of the legal voters in Massachusetts, in Maine, and in New Hampshire are black. Some of the legal voters in New York are black, and some of the legal voters in Ohio are of African descent. Does the Democratic party propose to march an army into New York and destroy that State government because it permits a negro to vote? I trust our opponents will be consistent, and if they attack universal suffrage in the South they will apply the same treatment to the northern States. If Arkansas should not be allowed to regulate the right of suffrage for herself, surely New York and Massachusetts should not.

The great leading feature of the southern States as now constituted is that the right of suffrage is extended to all adult males, excluding a very small proportion of the leaders in the late rebellion. If this is satisfactory to the citizens of those States nobody outside of them has any cause of complaint. If this state of things is not satisfactory to the citizens of those States it is open to them at any time in the regular legal and constitutional manner to change it.

Why, then, should we inaugurate civil war? What business have we to interfere with the institutions of South Carolina as long as her form of government is republican? If she likes it she will retain it. If she does not, she will change it, within the limits allowed by the Constitution of the United States; and General Frank P. Blair would be guilty of a very foul wrong in forcing upon that State, at the point of the bayonet, institutions of which her citizens do not approve.

Taxation of Government Bonds.

SPEECH OF HON. B. F. BUTLER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 14, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, said :

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the 22d day of May last, the representatives of the Republican party of the country assembled at Chicago, and laid before the country, as a portion of the policy which should govern it, the following almost axiomatic principle of political action:

"It is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced as rapidly as national faith will admit."

Shortly after, ninety-two Representatives of the people on this floor—almost an absolute majority of all the Representatives-elect, and an absolute majority of all the Republican party present—attempted to carry out this principle and make it the law of the land, as was their duty to do as Republicans, by voting to instruct their Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill for the taxation of the income derived from national interest-bearing securities. How that committee performed its duty, in obedience to such imperative order, I shall have the honor directly to bring to the attention of the House.

Let us at first, however, define carefully and distinctly what we mean by the equalization of taxation. I understand the phrase as used in the platform of our party to mean that all the invested capital of the country shall be subject to such rates of impost to be directly taken from its profits in such amounts and proportions as that in all its parts it shall bear its fair share of the burden of taxation equally relatively to productive capital and labor, due regard always being had to the amounts of such profits in comparison to other sources of income, discriminating with a sound discretion, if at all, against the profits of invested capital which are mere profits, and in favor of such profits as are derivable from labor alone or labor employed in conjunction with active capital. It is obvious to every one that this is the only definition of this plank of the platform which will bear examination for a moment.

What, then, are the interest-bearing securities of the United States? They make a peculiar class of property; invested productive capital to the owner, taxation to everybody else. If there were no tax to be paid by the people there would practically be no debt owed by the people. Everybody understands this. The public debt can affect the people in no other way than through taxation. Therefore I repeat the bonds of the United States are capital to the holder, but are taxation to every man in the nation.

Now, it will not be denied that all the securities of the United States, interest-bearing or other, substantially escape taxation. True we have an income tax of five per cent. upon them, but for reasons which will be seen in a moment, they in fact escape all taxation. When we first provided for these bonds we put an income tax upon them of one and a half per cent. That income tax was imposed in 1863, and kept on for two years; and returns can be found for those two years, from which it will be seen how nearly completely the capital invested in these bonds escapes all taxation. This income tax of one and a half per cent. was put on before the bonds were at all issued. In the year 1863 we ought to have received from this tax on the income derivable from the interest on the national indebtedness, if it had been honestly returned and collected, at least $1,300,000. How much did we actually receive? I have it here from the income returns of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that we received $75,000 only. For the year 1864 we should have received $1,700,000 from income returns from the interest of our national debt, if it had been honestly returned, but we actually received only $133,402 75, considerably less than one tenth. Therefore I have a right to say that quite all the income derivable from the interest-bearing securities of the United States escapes taxation. As all taxation upon incomes is now five per cent. since 1865, there have been no returns of the taxes raised on incomes from United States securities specifically, so that we can get no figures to verify the fact; but if the persons holding the United States securities in 1863 and 1864 would cheat the Government more than nine dollars out of every ten we should have received, to escape a tax of one and a half per cent. only, it is easy to imagine with sufficient certainty for all purposes of argument what is done to escape a tax of five per cent.

We have now $2,500,000,000 of invested capital in the interest-bearing securities of the United States, the most profitable investments of any in the country, every dollar of which we have seen escapes substantially all taxation, municipal, State, and national. Is that "the equal and just taxation due to the labor of the country" which allows so large an amount of its most profitable invested property to escape taxation, both State and national?

This $2,500,000,000 of capital is paying interest to the holders raised from the taxation of the people at such rates in gold or in currency that reckoning the premium forty-one and a half per cent. to-day it is less than the truth to say that it averages eight per cent. interest or $200,000,000 of income, all of it mere profit without a blow struck, a spade uplifted, or business transaction done, and without possibility of loss.

To allow this vast income wholly to escape all taxation seems therefore not to be that equality of taxation due to labor of which the Chicago resolution speaks, especially as labor, and ultimately nothing but labor, is taxed to pay it all.

It is no answer in amelioration of this great injustice, and yet it is the only one which I have ever heard, that much of this debt is held by men of small means in comparatively small sums; here our sympathies are always appealed to in behalf of the widows and orphans who own bonds, lest they, too, should be taxed; because whoever owns these securities holds them as an investment, a surplus over and above his daily wants, as a source of income without labor, while the masses of laboring men and women, widows and orphans, are struggling for daily bread by daily toil, borne down in that struggle by the burden of the taxes which must be imposed on the very necessities of living to pay this untaxed income of two hundred millions, however the same may be held, whether as the small incomes which escape taxation by exemption or by the millionaire who escapes through fraud. It is all one and the same thing to the overburdened people who toil to earn the means of living out of which this vast income is at last paid.

To remedy this so apparent injustice and wrong; to carry into effect the Chicago platform in this behalf; to show to the country that the Republican party by its laws deals equal justice to all men, the House of Representatives by a most decisive vote ordered the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill which should equalize taxation in some degree by imposing a tax upon this two hundred millions of income, which now escapes taxation, and thus make it bear a portion at least of its just share of the burdens of the Government of which this capital receives more than its share of the benefits.

This order of the House, so reasonable, so proper, so in accordance with party allegiance, so patriotic, appealing to the conscientious sense of fair play in every rightly balanced mind, one would have supposed would have been obeyed by that committee with joyful alacrity, springing with eagerness to aid and lead the House in this so noble a work of true legislation for the benefit of the many although not against the true interest of the few. How did that committee obey the order of the House? "What private griefs they had that made them do it, alas! I know not; but they are all, all honorable men."

They were ordered to bring in a bill levying a tax of at least ten per cent. on the interest of the bonds of the United States, to be collected by those charged with the duty of paying the interest on the bonded debt of the United States. They do bring in a bill to reduce the rate of interest on certain of the securities of the United States, but do not take anything from the seven-thirty securities. Being directed to levy a tax on the bonds which bear the rate of five and six per cent. interest in gold, which, being a very valuable and profitable security, might well be able to bear that rate of taxation, the committee, apparently for the purpose of bringing into odium the order of the House, report a bill to reduce the interest on the Government three per cent. certificates three tenths of one per cent. The committee left undone what they were ordered to do and did that which they were not ordered to do, and we might well complete the paraphrase by saying "and there is no health in them."

To insure the rejection of this relief of the people from taxation the committee accompany their bill, which neither they nor any one else will vote for, with a report which is remarkable as showing two things with remarkable clearness and effect: first, the perversity of the committee on this subject; secondly, the apparent want of acquaintance with the subject upon which they report.

They say the committee are opposed to the proposition embraced in this resolution. They need not have said that; the House and country knew that long ago. It is too well known that that committee are opposed to relieving the burdens of the people by any measure of taxation of the income of the bonded debt which is effectual. They had frittered nearly the whole session away and no measure of relief had by them been reported, either in taxing or funding the public debt, although many propositions had been sent them by the House to direct them to this object.

And when they are acting under the mandate of the House to do something on this behalf, the committee further say in their report that—

"They reserve to themselves their rights, as members of the House, to oppose in every possible way the adoption of a measure which they regard as hostile to the public interest and injurious to the national character."

Now, as a leading committee, by keeping back measures and obstructing the passage of bills which they report, can under the rules of the House almost surely defeat any measure, it is to the Committee of Ways and Means, so far as the House is concerned, that the country owes the loss of all effectual measures of financial relief during this session of Congress, and the loss of the fifteen or twenty millions which might and ought to have accrued to a depleted Treasury and a burdened, tax-ridden people from the most proper and legitimate source of revenue. Palnam qui meruit ferat. Let the committee have the credit of it if the people believe this right. Their Representatives in the House, by a vote of 92 to 54, ordered otherwise, but the committee have thwarted the execution of the will of the House. If this measure of taxing the income on the bonds less than any species of property is taxed in this country is (as the committee say) "hostile to the public interest and injurious to the national character," the people will condemn the House of Representatives for ordering it to be done. I speak this more in sorrow than in anger, but it is due to the House of Representatives that the country should know precisely why a measure of relief which I believe the people and the true interests of all demanded at our hands has failed, and why they must toil on another year to earn fifteen millions more of taxes. It is also due to the Republican party that it should be known that as a party we are not responsible for this failure. A majority of us voted for it. No man, Democrat or other on the committee, has raised a murmur against this its action. What I have here said will give each member of the committee an opportunity of saying whether he was for or against what the committee have done in this regard, and the country must judge. How much the committee are mistaken in the legal propositions upon which they found their report will be seen in the course of my observations.

The committee say, "But your committee have been unable to find in the statute-books of England or any other civilized country a law that could be regarded in any way as a precedent for the bill the House have instructed the committee to report, which, if enacted, will be simply a law providing for the payment of a rate of interest on the Government debt ten per cent. less than was agreed for."

The provisions of law which the committee are unable to find to justify the House in its vote in any civilized country are, therefore, first, a law providing for a tax of ten per cent. on the interest of the public debt; second, a provision of law that such tax shall be collected by the public officers paying that interest to the public creditors.

This is all the resolution the House ordered the committee to report a bill to do. This they refuse to do because they can find no precedent for it in any civilized country. In order to see how completely the law and precedents of taxation of England cover and justify the action of the House, I pray you, Mr. Chairman, to go with me in a cursory examination of the history of taxation in England. The importance and instructiveness of the topic will amply requite the tedium of the task.

In order that any gentleman may follow me and see if I am correct, and that there may be no mistake in what I say, that cannot be corrected in my citations of authority, (for citations of authorities are not always correctly given,) I will give the book from which I quote.

I have extracted the following provisions from Senior's Income Tax Law, London edition of 1863. It is the handbook of English tax duties, according to which their tax law is administered.

The first income-tax act was that of 1798, and was based on the taxation of incomes according to certain taxes already assessed upon a graduated scale. Thus if a person were assessed on servants, carriages, and horses, he was to pay additional duties as an income tax. Such persons were by this act, if assessed for under twenty-five pounds, to pay three times the amount; if for thirty, and under forty, to pay four times the amount; if fifty and upward, five times the amount, and another schedule fixed duties to be paid by persons assessed for houses, windows, dogs, clocks, and watches.

As it affected those persons exclusively who were already assessed certain taxes, this act was a failure, for by giving up the kind of property subject to these taxations they got rid of the new tax. Therefore, it became necessary in 1799, to try a duty of ten per cent. on all incomes above £200, with a graduated scale for those below.

The reasons for this new levy was, as the statute said, because there were sundry instances of evasion of the old act, and the new tax was laid "to establish an equalization of taxation as far as practicable by human means."

It will be observed that here is a precedent for laying a ten per cent. income tax; so the House has English precedent so far.

Each person was required to give in the gross amount of his whole income according to a schedule of descriptions very like that of our income tax.

But while this taxation was very inquisitorial, it was also very unproductive, so much so that it continued but three years; and the present system in England of charging the income tax on all properties and incomes however derived, or their source, was introduced.

This was done by the act of 1803, which levied five per cent. on incomes at their sources, and was efficacious in bringing almost as much to the revenue as was obtained by a levy of ten per cent. on gross incomes.

In 1806 the rate was again fixed at ten per cent. Another precedent for taxing our bonds ten per cent. Prior to this time exemption had been granted for incomes on realized properties under sixty pounds.

It was found necessary to repeal this exemption and substitute a graduated scale, as it was productive of the greatest frauds upon the public.

The act of 1806 was repealed in 1816, but was substantially reenacted by Sir Robert Peel in 1842. In the meanwhile there was no income tax.

The duty imposed in 1842 was seven pence in the pound upon incomes, exempting those of certain classes under £150 a year. Peel's act relieved the farmers, however, by imposing the tax on rent of land in England at three and a half pence per pound.

This act remained substantially in force until 1853. On the declaration of war with Russia in 1854, the income tax was doubled; and a further increase was imposed of two pence in the pound on incomes of £150 and upward; and one and a half pence on incomes of £100; and a graduated scale for incomes under that sum.

Schedule C of this tax act comprises all profits due from interest, annuities, dividends, or shares of annuities, or, in other words, upon any portion of the public debt.

To prevent frauds in these taxations all incomes arising from interest or dividends, or anything in the nature of funded property, were required to be returned and accounted for by the persons paying them, not by the persons receiving the interest or dividend.

For example, on a loan on mortgage for £10,000, the mortgagor deducts the duty from his interest, paying that to the Government and the remainder to the mortgagee.

For taxes upon all profits arising from any interest, annuities, or dividends, payable from any public funds no return was required from the person receiving them as in the case of other species of property, but the taxes were retained half yearly by those Government officers having such public funds in charge, and paid to the receiver general of income tax by the officers charged with paying such interest, who were made assessors for that purpose. Such assessors certified the income tax at the time of the payment of the interest, annuities, or dividends of the public debt to the officer appointed to pay it, who retained it and paid it over to the receiver general, and this was the course pursued as to the taxes upon the national debt, the colonial revenue, and the foreign revenue.

It will thus be seen that the House has the fullest English precedent since 1799 for assessing the taxes on income of the public debt directly, and collecting it by the officer paying the interest to the public creditor, so that we have full and complete English laws for doing that which the committee reported they could find no precedent for doing in England or any other civilized country. The same law exists to-day in Italy and Austria. It is to be feared that the committee did not search as closely as they might have done if they had not been hostile to the proposition!

I might stop here and the case of the House against the committee would be triumphantly won so far as precedent is concerned.

But there are objections raised by others to the taxation of the income upon the interest coupons which it may be well to consider, as they are answered by the English practice. One of these objections is that by so collecting your income-tax you would collect a tax on foreigners who may hold your bonds, and we are told that cannot be done consistently with public faith. Let us examine the English precedents a little further.

There were but four classes of exemption from this income-tax on public stocks, to wit: Stock held by friendly institutions or mutual relief societies and savings-banks, with certain exceptions, stocks of incorporated charities, religious houses and colleges, stock belonging to the national Treasury, her majesty, and foreign ministers actually resident in England. So it appears that England taxes all foreigners who own her bonds, an income-tax, unless they are foreign ministers actually resident there. But England went further than we propose to go. She taxed the principal as well as the interest of her public debt in certain cases, yet she is never called a repudiator.

All the English tax acts require the duty to be levied on each annuity of her public debt, as well those terminable as those perpetual or interminable; and this, too, whether the annuity arose from a loan to the Government or to private individuals.

Now, a terminable annuity popularly defined is an agreement on the part of the borrower to pay each year a sum, with a given rate of interest, which will repay the whole principal loaned and interest at the end of the agreed period.

Yet the English tax acts require that these annual repayments and their interest shall be assessed as other incomes or profits were, and the tax retained by the individual or Government owing them for the benefit of the Treasury.

It will be thus seen that the Government taxed the principal as well as the interest of so much of its public debt as was borrowed on terminable annuities.

This is the same as would be the taxing of its bonds, principal as well as interest, by the United States, and deducting the amount on the payment of the coupons; yet this was never deemed a repudiation of its debt by the English Government, or any part thereof, but simply a proper exercise of the right of sovereignty in equalizing the taxes upon its citizens.

It will be seen, therefore, that England taxed her public debt according to her exigencies up to ten per cent.; that she collected this tax from all those to whom she paid interest, whether citizens or foreigners, by deducting the tax at the payments; and that she taxed income derived from this source higher than some other sources of income.

Thus she taxes one half of the amount only of the income derived from rents or from occupied land or the farmer of land, and the whole amount of that derived from the public debt; in other words, her taxes on income from annuities and dividends, seven pence, and on her farmers or rents three and a half pence in the pound. Just one half. Mark that! Is not this a justification as a precedent for taxing the interest on our bonds ten per cent. while we tax other incomes only five per cent.? What answer can the Committee of Ways and Means make to this precedent?

Mr. GARFIELD. I took down the sentence as just spoken, and I desire to ask if it is correct. They tax the land at three and a half per cent. and the interest on the debt at seven per cent.?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Every body in the House who heard me will tell you it is not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desired to get the gentleman correctly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have it written here, and I cannot have made such a mistake. The duty assessed was seven pence in the pound except on incomes of less than £150. They assessed the incomes derived from occupation of land at half its value, or three and a half pence, and that relieved the farmer. Therefore, the tax derived from income of rent of lands is one half that derived from other sources.

Mr. GARFIELD. The sentence I wrote down was, "The tax on land was one half the tax on the public debt." Is that true?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; the tax on the income derived from the occupation of land is one half that derived from the public debt in England. Understand me so that there may be no mistake.

Mr. PIKE. That is in addition to the tax on the value of the land.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Land bears its taxes there precisely as it does here, our local taxes. This tax of which I speak is upon the income from the occupation of the land, and that is one half of that taken from the public debt.

But this latter is collected by the person paying the interest on the public debt in whatever form it is found, and not from the person receiving it, not trusting to his conscience only to find out what his income is, and thereby losing nearly all your tax.

Better somebody take that down, for it is quite important.

Precisely as we instructed our Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill providing an income tax to be collected by the Treasurer of the United States on the coupons. In answer they report to the House, in a manner that would be impudently done if it were not ignorantly done, that there is no precedent for such a tax in any civilized country.

Let me repeat—England taxes the income of her national debt more than some other incomes, and has it collected by the person paying it on her behalf. Thus taxing all income—the public debt, the colonial debt, the foreign revenue, bank dividend, interest on mortgages, and annuities—everything of the sort, and collects the tax of everybody whose income is derived therefrom above a certain amount—and she has not always even exempted those—at home or abroad, domestic or alien, save religious and charitable societies, resident foreign ministers, and the queen.

England is wise enough (and has a committee of her House of Commons that will do its bidding in that behalf) to tax the source of income and not the stream; to levy the tax at the fountain of profit and gain of the tax-payer instead of attempting to collect it after it had been frittered away, dissipated, or concealed. She forces her subjects to be honest in their income returns and thus equalizes and lightens the burdens of her taxation. She does not frame her tax laws as ours are, to get only the tax upon the income of the upright and conscientious who will make true returns of their incomes while the dishonest and corrupt escape taxation on their incomes altogether.

There is one other fact about the taxation of England which may be instructive and useful to those anti-paying, anti-tax gentlemen who affect to believe that taxation of the income derived from the interest of our bonds is repudiation, and at the same time point to England as the exemplar of national financial faith.

England has for many years taxed the principal as well as the interest of her public debt in some of its forms. And although frequent attempts have been made in Parliament to procure a change of this mode of taxation.

they have always hitherto been unsuccessful. The tax comes in this way. Earlier than this century a large portion of her debt was in what is known as terminable annuities. It was then a successful method of raising money by the Government and a favorite investment by the subject, especially the retired capitalists.

A terminable annuity may be popularly defined and illustrated in its effect in this way: the Government borrows £100, agreeing to pay it back in twenty years in equal annual installments, with interest at three and a half per cent. There is paid, therefore, five pounds each year, and the interest on the balance remaining unpaid until all is paid. Now, if these annual payments, which are part of the principal, as well as the interest, are taxed as income, it will be seen at once that the principal is subject to a yearly tax as income.

Precisely as if, in our ten-forty bonds, we should agree to pay a fortieth part of the bond yearly and the interest, and we should then tax these yearly payments as income. This is precisely what England has done and is doing, and yet her committees of Parliament never charge her with repudiation or call hard names or refuse to obey the order of the House of Commons.

I have been thus careful in going over this matter, because I am combating what has been said here by a committee of this House, in solemn report to this House, to excuse them from neglecting to obey an order of the House passed by a larger majority than almost any other contested measure passed by the House in this Congress. What, then, is their claim? They claim that it will be repudiation to tax the income on our bonds. Repudiation is it? Let us see how that is. When we issued those bonds, the tax therefrom was only one and a half per cent. on the incomes derived from them, and it was three per cent. on all other income. Did anybody ever cry out "Repudiation" when we raised that tax on incomes to five per cent? Certainly not. And why? Because so long as we left the return of income to the oath of the bondholders, they cared nothing about the tax upon the income derived from bonds, although we more than trebled it.

But now, when we ask here for a tax of ten per cent. or only double the present tax, instead of treble as before, but levied in such a way that the rogue shall pay it as well as the honest man, there is raised the hue and cry of "breach of good faith," and "repudiation." It is not because the income had never been taxed before that all this cry is raised against such taxation. But because we raised it five per cent. and made it easier for a man honestly to return his income, by paying back to the Government five per cent. of the interest he receives. This will suit all honest men, but the rogues will howl. If every man would honestly return all the income he has, as the law is now, and we should get the five per cent. upon it, there would be no need for any legislation, except as it may be best to put a larger tax on the interest of the bonds which now escape all taxation, State and municipal, burdens which other property has to bear.

We propose, therefore, to add five per cent., so as to equalize the taxation of this property with other property, and to make men honest by taxing the income at the source. What is the objection to that? It is said that we repudiate by taxing the interest on bonds ten per cent. Is it not just as much repudiation to tax five per cent.? If our instructions to our committee had been to bring in a bill at five per cent. all the difference between that and the present law would have been that one proposal would have made men honest in spite of themselves in this matter at least. But whenever we undertake to do that by legislation nowadays, whether in regard to whisky or indeed anything else, men begin to cry out you must keep "faith," you are taxing us too much, your penalties are too severe.

Again, it is said, as a reason why we should not tax this source of income in a manner equal and just to all, that we have no right to tax foreigners. "You are breaking faith with some broker in Frankfort, Bremen, London, or elsewhere." Any cry will do to save the bondholder from having his fair share of the public burdens in return for his more than just share of the public benefits!

But we have a right to tax foreigners. Why not? If a foreigner, wherever he may live, owns any land in a State do you not tax that land and the income? Yes. If an alien owns any other property other than land in a city, do you not tax that property and the income thereof? Do they let the non-residents and foreigners all escape taxation in Ohio, for instance. There is a story, which I presume is a slander, that in that State, as well as some others, they tax the foreigner and non-resident a little higher than they do their own citizens. It may be said the property is taxed and not the owners in this case. So I say here the income is taxed and not the owner. But it is argued that the property which you tax in your State is there under your laws while the alien has the bond with him, so the property is not here. I pray judgment. The bond which the foreigner takes abroad is only an evidence of debt, property, the same as his deed of land is evidence of a title to property here. But the income of his property, evidenced by his bond, is earned here and is payable and paid here, comes from our citizens, their labors, their toil, is from us, is of us, and should be taxed as we are. Who shall gainsay this and not fail?

If this were a new question, were the proposition without precedent, which it is not, the argument would be irresistible.

I am not, however, left without the fullest authority and precedent of laws for taxing foreigners. We have already seen that England taxes all owners of bonds, alien and citizen; and you yourselves by your own act (tax act of July, 1866) have by very name taxed every foreigner owning any bonds or stock issued by any corporation in the United States.

We tax those bonds and collect the tax, too, in exactly the same way in which our proposed law taxes and collects the tax on the income on United States bonds. We collect the tax on the corporation bond by deducting it from the interest on the coupons. I read from section one hundred and twenty-two of your internal revenue law passed July 13, 1866:

"That any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack-water company, indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per cent. on the amount of all such interest, or coupons, dividends, or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens; and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest, or coupons, and dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of five per cent."

Is not this a complete answer to the suggestion that you cannot tax the foreigner on the income of his bond because he has it with him out of the country? Does he not have his railroad bond with him? It has been said that this taxation infringes on the maxim, "No taxation without representation;" but this suggestion has been overruled in every State that taxes the property of non-residents, and all so do. It is too puerile to need further examination.

If the foreigner living abroad owns bonds of the Illinois Railroad Company, for example, you, by the section I have just read, make it the duty of the treasurer of that company to deduct from his coupon when he sends it here for payment five per cent. as an income tax. Why should you not in like manner direct the Treasurer of the United States to deduct a tax from the coupons of the United States bonds when they are presented for payment? Is there any other answer than to say, "Because we never have done it." I agree that we never have done it. England did not do it till she found she was cheated out of her revenue by false returns. We never had an internal revenue law till a few years ago. We always had slavery till 1863; is that a reason why we should have it now? This is the same argument by which the continuance of old abuses has always been advocated. We always have had by our internal revenue laws, unequal, and therefore unjust taxation. It has become a crying evil. Now we are instructed and pledged by the Chicago platform that "it is due to the labor of the country to equalize taxation." Shall we do it?

Mark now, and see how we stand! We do tax aliens. We do tax other bonds and collect it by deducting the tax from the coupons. Why should we not tax the United States bonds in the same way? Why do we tax in that way the bonds of canals, railroads, and other companies in order to get the full and honest tax? Why should we not tax and collect in the same way the taxes on their incomes of men holding Government securities? Why not equalize taxation so far as to make honest returns of incomes? This much equalization at least is due to labor according to the declaration of the Chicago platform; and is there any breach of "national faith" in so framing our laws that the rogues and rascals shall not cheat the Government out of these income taxes? Do we mean it, or is this plank in our party platform but the fly of a trap, as our enemies charge; a delusion and a snare by which to entrap the people to vote for that which we do not mean to carry out in our legislation? I here declare for myself and for the majority of the party whose Representatives on this floor voted with me, that we do mean it. We are honest about it, and intent upon it; and God giving us strength we will see that taxation is equalized, and our laws shall be framed so that all men, whether foreign or citizen, shall make honest and true returns of their incomes from all their profit; shall deal fairly and justly by the Government and bear their due share of our heavy burdens.

All admit that we have the right to impose an income tax. If men will return it under oath we are all willing to collect it. We are ready to take it from the honest men. Now, let us see whether we are not ingenious enough and steadfast enough to frame our laws so as to catch the rascals and make them honest men in this regard. They will howl, I know; but, sir, let them howl; they always do.

Have ever we pledged ourselves that we would not tax these bonds? Never. At the very time we issued them we put a tax on the income from them. We have always taxed the income. All that this bill which we instructed the Committee of Ways and Means to prepare and report would do would be to make the holders of our bonds, whether those holders be abroad or at home, honest in their returns of their incomes for taxation. The only change, theoretically or practically, if men were honest, is that we make the tax upon the income ten per cent. instead of five per cent., as now, and the reason to justify so doing I will advert to in a moment. It is said that the tax becomes repudiation because it is so large. It is only six tenths of one per cent. on the income of a six per cent. bond. One gentleman came to me and said, "Put the rate at five per cent. and we will agree to your proposition;" in other words, "If you will enact only a little repudiation it is not objectionable; infant repudiation is innocent, but full grown repudiation is intolerable!" It is not repudiation to tax five per cent., but ten per cent. is repudiation and a breach of national faith. Why do we put our mark of taxation on incomes at ten per cent. and five on other incomes derived from bonds? It is because it is both statesmanlike and just to discriminate, as all nations do, and as in our present tax acts, and we do discriminate against that property which is of the highest value and makes the largest returns. How else do we sustain ourselves in taxing so highly whisky and tobacco, petroleum and other like articles of great profit? It is because the largest returns for the amount invested may be got from them. The bonds have two other elements of value which would justify a higher tax than another investment; they are more certain and more safe and stable than other investments. That is one ground upon which we are able to sustain ourselves in our rate of taxation.

Taxation of Government Bonds—Mr. Butler.

There is another reason why Government bonds should be taxed higher upon their income than other property. These investments have already doubled in value. Eight tenths of them were bought since the battle of Gettysburg, after the war was substantially settled, many of them with gold at 250 to 285 premium, costing from thirty-five to thirty-seven cents on the dollar. They have now gone up with gold at 140 only, and bonds at 118 to 118 premium. The property, therefore, itself has doubled. As an investment these have proved profitable to all; and is there any reason why they should not be taxed according to their value and profitability. If the bondholder gets twice as much income from his investment as another person does from his, then is there any reason why he should not pay twice as much, too?

It is said I am mistaken; that the bonds do not sell at so high a price. Has any gentleman a price-current list? Let me see what bonds are to-day.

A MEMBER. Here is to-day's Tribune.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That will do. To-day the highest were 118½. That is one kind. Then 108½, 108½, and 108½; that is for six per cent. bonds! Here we see before us a cogent reason for taxing these at a higher rate, thus discriminating against them.

But that is not all. These bonds of the Government are the only class of property which escapes taxation, State, municipal, and local. All other property a man owns upon earth in this country has to pay from one to two per cent. State and local tax. This one escapes all taxation, State and municipal, under the law. Nor am I to be told that because we promised not to allow the State and counties to tax these bonds that therefore we are never to tax the income derivable from them, taking into view in so doing their extreme profitability to the holder, because of this and other reasons? No, sir, I propose to keep faith with bondholders and uphold this promise, but as a legislator of the United States I may exercise my discretion to put them upon equal terms as to taxation with other property in the United States. The exemption from State taxation was not intended as a boon to the bondholder simply. It was an exercise of the sovereignty of the nation. And this exemption cannot interfere with our sovereignty over this and kindred questions. We may equalize taxation on this property by bringing it on a par as to burden and impost with other property. That rests in our discretion alone.

What is ten per cent. on the income? On five per cent. bonds, five tenths of one per cent. that is all. All we propose to tax this property thus exempted from all other taxes, duties, or imposts is one sixth of one per cent. on six per cent. bonds, and five tenths of one per cent. on five per cent. bonds. And the difficulty which presses me in this regard is that by so small a tax we do not, in the language of the Chicago platform, equalize taxation. Our proposition by no means brings this property up to an equal share of the burdens of taxation.

It is urged we must not impose this tax because it would be unjust to the banks; that they own large amounts of these bonds with which to secure their circulation upon which they pay a large tax. The Comptroller of the Currency in his report to Congress undertakes to argue this question in behalf of the banks. I wish to call the attention of the House to that argument. We had a right to ask at least that a high financial officer of the Government should not attempt to mislead us by a mistaken array of figures, manipulated to serve a purpose, but not to furnish information.

If it shall prove that the Comptroller, an officer of the people, perverts or falsifies data and amounts, and conceals facts of interest to the people which ought to be known to them, I ask you what faith you will put in a public officer who misstates, for the purpose of misleading, plain facts and figures?

I take my figures from the Comptroller's report, so that he is responsible for their correctness. The fact is, therefore, that on this 1st day of October, 1867, the national banks had in circulation in round numbers say $300,000,000. Three hundred million dollars secured by a deposit of $340,000,000 in United States bonds, bearing five and six per cent. interest in gold, to the amount of $19,500,000. Now, assuming that these bonds cost the banks par in currency, they yearly receive interest from the Government in gold at forty-one premium, amounting to $27,395,000 in lawful money. Besides for this deposit the banks receive from the Government three hundred millions of money without any interest, which they loan at bank interest, say eight per cent., and thus in fact receive twenty four millions more, making in all $51,395,000, which they receive from the Government for a loan of $340,000,000 only, or more than fifteen per cent. on their investment.

This pays no income tax, however. It is true that the banks pay other taxes on their business capital and dividends, as well to the General Government as to the States; but they pay the same and no more in proportion for their privileges than do other people.

How does the Comptroller of the Currency state these plain figures in arguing the case for the banks? Admitting that the banks receive $19,500,000 from the United States, he states the case thus:

The banks have loaned the Government, as follows:
For bonds deposited to secure their circulation bearing six per cent. interest.....$250,000,000
Bearing five per cent. interest.....90,000,000
Permanent reserve of legal tenders.....150,000,000

Total loan to the United States.....$490,000,000

For which they receive—

Six per cent interest on $250,000,000.....$15,000,000
Five per cent interest on $90,000,000.....4,500,000

Total.....$19,500,000
But they refund in taxes.....16,000,000

Leaving.....$3,500,000

Now, in this statement there are several very gross mistakes, calculated to mislead.

First. The "permanent reserve of legal tenders" are held by the bankers in interest-bearing notes of the United States, formerly largely in compound-interest six per cent. notes, so that they are always on interest, and the Comptroller gives no credit for that interest. Why not, if he means to state the case fairly?

Second. The $19,500,000 interest which the banks receive is in gold, while the $16,000,000 they refund in taxes (which, by the way, are the same everybody else pays for his capital and business) is in currency, which of itself would make a difference with gold at forty-one per cent. premium of $11,395,000 in favor of the banks and against the Government. How could the Comptroller overlook such an item as that if he meant to be fair and just in his statements?

Third. Worse than all, the Comptroller forgets to state the $24,000,000 at least of interest which the banks receive on the greenbacks which they get back as currency from the Government without interest. With these so patent omissions and misstatements am I not justified in saying that the argument of the Comptroller of the Currency, put forth in behalf of the banks to enable them to execute further taxation, is at once illusory and delusive, and yet it is the best argument that can be made in their behalf.

Shall we, therefore, stay our hand in equalizing taxation because of the bonds held by the banks on which they make such large profits? Clearly not. They should come under a just income tax with the rest of the people on the bonds the United States hold in trust to secure their circulation. I have not time to elaborate the argument as I might do as to the profits made upon Government deposits in the banks, and the necessity and justice of an income tax on the bonds held to secure those. The considerations which apply with equal force to that class of bonds held by the banks as to the other will at once suggest themselves to every intelligent and just mind.

I think, however, I may safely say further, that the most far-seeing bankers will themselves agree with me that it were far better for the holders of the bonds, whether corporations or individuals, that there should be a just and equal tax assessed upon their incomes in proportion to their profits, for no business or financial interest can long contend against a people feeling itself aggrieved by an apparent injustice and inequality in the execution of the laws.

Is it not unjust to other tax-payers to leave these bonds without taxation either on principal or interest, and if they are so left long there can be but one result. A man having ten thousand or one hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, and taxed thereon for State and national purposes in various forms two per cent. on his income, which may not be more than six or seven, will not long stand quietly by and see his neighbor with the same amount invested in bonds, on which he is receiving nine per cent. interest, pay, in fact, no interest whatever; because he knows, as all of us know, that so long as the incomes on bonds are taxable on the conscience of the holder only, the coupons being passed from hand to hand when they are collected, the owners of all this class of property escape taxation.

Let me briefly sketch another illustration of this inequality of taxation which actually happened in my own neighborhood. There is a farmer owning a farm worth $10,000, upon which he does hard work enough every year to earn the support which he is able to give his family from his farm were he a mechanic. That farmer pays a tax to the State of $180, in various forms of State, county, and town taxes, to support schools and highways; and to the Government he pays, directly and indirectly, a tax of $200 more. His net returns from his farm are less than $1,000. He has a neighbor living near by him owning $100,000 of the bonds of the Government on which he receives as interest $9,000 a year, on which no dollar of State, county, town, school, or highway taxes is paid. The farmer as he toils under the burning sun to earn the money to pay his taxes sees his neighbor riding luxuriously by in his carriage over the highway which farmers' taxes only have built and maintained. His neighbor's children and his own go to the same school supported by his taxes alone. He ponders, as he labors, upon the system of laws, which thus compels him to work to pay for the education of his wealthy neighbor's children, and as he reflects he will convince himself that he is suffering a bitter, burning wrong, and no argument will convince him to the contrary. If, then, you expect that farmer to vote for any man or party that retains a system of taxation which works such results, you expect what never has happened, what never will happen, and what ought never to happen in any civilized land. Change it how you will or can; but it must be changed. If you do not give relief by law the people will relieve themselves without you. The arguments by which you justify and sustain it, however specious or however sound, will fall unheeded on unwilling ears. You may cry out "good faith" till you are hoarse. You will be answered that there is no good faith which works injustice and wrong to a whole people. There is this alternative, no other. Ponder it well—equalized taxation or repudiation.

Comprehending this great fact, do not content yourselves with being angry with him who announces it to you. Vituperation, calumny, imputations upon his motives, will neither change the fact nor make it one whit less true, less formidable, or relieve you one jot from the necessity of meeting it and providing for it.

There is a mistaken idea honestly entertained by some persons which requires a single observation, because unfounded assertions of right, when conscientiously believed, are entitled to respect. An honest prejudice even should not be carelessly put aside without answer.

It is believed by some that Congress has given a pledge not to tax these bonds, and to do so would be a breach of national faith, and therefore of national honor, as it indeed would be if any such pledge had been given. No such pledge was given. On the contrary, it was expressly put in the law that the national securities should be free from State and municipal taxation, not from national taxation. Indeed, I doubt under the doctrines of the Supreme Court in the case of Brown vs. Maryland, and other kindred cases, whether national bonds could have been taxed by the States even if they had been expressly made so taxable by Congress. They certainly could not have been so taxed if Congress had said nothing on the subject.

We hold all our property subject to the action of Congress, to be taxed or not, as Congress pleases, whether bonds or other property. And so holding that property it is for the wisdom of Congress to tax it as much or as little as the exigencies of the Government demand and justice to all interests of the people require.

You have pledged no faith to the bondholder that you would not tax these bonds. They were not even sold by any broker under any such pledge.

Congress has said only that the States should not tax them; but has not said that you yourselves would not. On the contrary, you did tax the income upon them at the very moment you issued them; and you have since raised that tax from one and a half per cent. to five per cent.; and I only ask now that you shall raise this tax upon this species of property so as to make it nearly equal to the taxes on other property, and to take means to collect it of all the bad men as you do now the five per cent. of all the good men, allowing the bad ones to escape.

Taxation now falls only on the just and conscientious, those who truthfully return their incomes. The unjust, the rascal, the knave, the rebel, makes no return and escapes taxation. The State of Georgia, for instance, made a return of but a single gold watch; and I have not heard that it has made a return of any bonds. The true man, the honest man, the conscientious man returns his bonds and you tax him and let the rogue escape taxation. Such a state of the law can never be allowed to remain without convulsion. If not corrected soon it will not remain without resistance to it, and the man who feels its injustice and sees no hope of remedy would almost be justified in such resistance.

I speak, therefore, in the interest of the bondholder; in the interest of the banks, as well as in the far higher and greater interest of the people of the country. Were I the paid advocate of the banker and the bondholder instead of the representative of the people; were I here to establish their investments on the surest and firmest basis, irrespective of any other consideration, I should still argue as I do.

In my poor judgment, permanency, quietness, and stability of investment are the first great needs of capital. Capitalists desire no controversy, fear lest their investments be involved in political changes, and are naturally conservative to the last degree; for their own sake it is desirable that the bonds be taxed, and taxed fairly, according to their productiveness with other property, so that there should be in holding them no apparent injustice or wrong that could appeal to honest prejudice even and they be made the football of party strife.

No people ever yet rested quiet under a sense of injustice. No free people ever did submit to allow a privileged class to draw their income from the public revenue without the fullest contribution of their fair share of that revenue. Equal taxation of the income of the debt or its repudiation is inevitable. He is short-sighted and ill-judging in the last degree who opposes the private interest of the few to the sense of wrong of the many; and it is no answer to that sense of wrong to say that many of the bonds are held in small parcels by men of moderate means, because whoever holds a Government bond holds it as an invested surplus of property. It is what he has laid by, and those who have it are but one in twenty to those who have it not, and the twenty have in this Government a score times as much political power as the one. No intelligent laboring man can ever be persuaded by any argument that invested capital, in amounts large or small, ought to escape the equal burdens of taxation which are laid upon his earnings.

If the capitalist shall choose to oppose himself and subject his investments to the operation of this sense of wrong, he will find that when aroused it will not content itself with righting that wrong simply, but will surge over in a wave of popular indignation, which will inflict irreparable injury upon him and his.

I speak in the interest of the Republican party, the party of equal rights, of equal justice to all men. We are responsible for the past, and I trust for four years to come will be responsible for the action of the Government, and the justice and propriety of the laws. Enjoying the high confidence of the people who have so largely put their trust in us, they will never suffer us to enact injustice. They will not permit us to recognize by our laws any favored class in this country; they will call upon us to make good our principles of equality of right, of equality of power, of equality of burdens of government to all men; and as surely as we fail to do this so surely will the people fail us. Looking, therefore, to the success of the Republican party as the success of the country, I cannot do otherwise than to impress upon the majority of this House the necessity of making that enunciation of our principles at Chicago which declares for the equalization of taxation a living and acting, as well as essential principle of our political ethics.

Lastly, I speak in the interest of the whole people of the country. I see, or think I see, in this question of the public debt a wedge by which the Union may be again riven asunder—not by a line dividing North from South, but another more fatal, running north and south, possibly along the ridge of the Alleghenies, separating the eastern creditor States, with their accumulated capital and commercial and manufacturing investments, from the western debtor agricultural States lying in the rich valleys of the Mississippi and its tributaries. I see the revolutionary and disorganizing party of the falsely-named Democracy, while differing upon other issues, yet with their ranks serried, enthusiastically hailing the proposition to use the prejudices and discontents of the people in regard to the public debt as a means of placing again the Government in the hands of rebels and their associates that its great powers may again be used to accomplish its own destruction.

They have attempted to divide the whole country upon that most vicious dogma of a "white man's Government." That question, however, in its present attitude has nothing in it of sectionalism. It may divide parties but it cannot divide the Union, as its opponents and adherents are found in every portion of the country, and in it there can be nothing of sectional antagonism of interest. But if they can oppose the interest of the agricultural labor of the West to the manufacturing labor of the East, already in some degree antagonized on the subject of the tariff, by an exhibition of the apparent injustice of taxing the labor of the West while more than two billions and a half of most productive capital at the East goes untaxed; by showing, as they may do, that three fourths of the whole banking capital of the country, with its necessary privileges and specialties of legislation, is east of the Alleghenies, they will have injected into the politics of the nation an element the mischievous extent of which no man can fathom.

Let it be our part, having the power in our own hands, by carefully, judiciously, and firmly removing all source of complaint of inequality of taxation, by opening as far as possible to the West the benefits to be derived from banking associations, by establishing free banking, to thus take out of the political arena this apple of discord, so cunningly thrown in, which may engender a worse than Trojan strife.

Believing, as I most firmly do, that in this question much of the honor, the glory, and future of our country is involved; seeing it with a clearness of apprehension which compels my judgment, while I shall never attempt to reply to my enemies, I can only answer my friends who differ with me, in whose judgment I have confidence, as did Luther his religious associates when they reproached him for opposing them, "God help me, I cannot do otherwise."

Taxation of Government Bonds.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE,

July 15, 1868,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with every gentleman who has honored the speakers of the evening by sitting in this Hall, with the mercury at ninety-three degrees, and attempting to listen to a financial debate. But the subject discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] last evening was of such transcendent importance, and the views he submitted to the House seemed to me of so very singular a character in some of their aspects, that I feel justified in asking your attention to what I shall say in answer to them.

I ought to say in the outset that I had already prepared a brief in answer to a speech, not delivered, but printed, by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] on this same subject not many days ago. And as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in his speech last evening, indorsed almost every position taken by the gentleman from Maine, especially his statements in regard to the history of English taxation as a precedent for the proposed measure, I can do no better than to consider first the points made by the gentleman from Maine, and then notice any special points made in addition by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his speech of last evening. And I desire in the outset to disclaim any purpose or wish to exempt from its full and proper share of taxation any species of property in the United States, and least of all that kind of property which is not actively employed in the production of national wealth. I am not the defender of any particular class of property or property holders. I seek rather to defend the truth of history as it bears on this subject, and to defend our financial system from a most dangerous innovation, ruinous alike to the revenue and to public credit.

Let us examine for a moment the history of the issue raised by these gentlemen, in order to ascertain precisely what it is. The feeling has been, and still is, very general throughout the country that the holders of our national bonds do not bear an equal share of the burdens of taxation, and many plans have been proposed to readjust our financial machinery so as to levy on that class of the community a heavier tax than they now pay. Nothing is more gratifying to a Representative than to be able to meet and satisfy a popular demand. But how to meet this one lawfully, honestly, and wisely has been, and still is, a matter of great difficulty. The Democratic party proposed that the State should tax the bonds, just as they tax real and personal property. But the law creating the bonds specially declares them exempt from all State and municipal taxation, and even if the law were silent on the subject the Constitution of the United States interposes to prevent it. In a long line of judicial decisions, extending over nearly half a century, it has been again and again declared by the Supreme Court that such taxation is forbidden by the Constitution.

The payment of the bonds in depreciated paper currency has been another favorite plan for reaching the same result; but that dishonest scheme has been severely if not fatally damaged by the refusal of the late Democratic convention to nominate its most prominent supporter.

Many other schemes, which I need not stop to enumerate, have been offered during the present session, looking to the same ultimate result, such as taxing the principal of the public debt by Congress, and other similar plans. I will only state particularly those propositions recently made, which have resulted in the passage of a resolution by this House, which I believe the House will not sanction when it has maturely reviewed and considered the subject.

On the 26th day of June, while the bank sections of the internal revenue tax bill was before the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] offered an amendment in these words:

"That upon all interest arising from bonds of the United States there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of ten per cent. on the amount of such interest, and the Treasurer of the United States, and such subordinate officers as shall be charged with the payment of said interest, shall assess and collect the duty hereby levied."

It was ruled out of order as not germane to the bill then pending. The financial leader of the Democratic party on this floor, [Mr. HOLMAN,] came to his support at a late period of the same day by offering a proposition differing from the above only in this—that it fixed the rate of taxation at sixteen and two thirds per cent. This was also ruled out of order. Still later in the day, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] offered an amendment to the bank section of the tax bill which was in order, and under the cover of which the three gentlemen discussed their several projects. Their labor was not lost, though another has reaped whatever of glory may be supposed to result from the enterprise. Their propositions were embodied in a resolution of peremptory instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill levying a direct tax of ten per cent. on the interest of the public debt and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates to withhold that amount when the coupons were presented for payment. This resolution was introduced into the House on the 29th of June by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] and was passed under the previous question, without a word of debate permitted. Every Democrat present save one voting for it.

Though the desire has been very general, I may perhaps say almost universal, among the members of this Congress to lay a heavier burden of taxation on the holders of bonds—yet the House had been restrained from such measures as the Cobb resolution—by a sentiment deeply ingrained into the Anglo Saxon character, that it is honest to pay what we fairly and lawfully promise, and dishonest to refuse. But the gentleman from Maine undertook to remove that ethical difficulty by assuring the House that Great Britain has long been doing precisely the thing he desires us to do. I have no doubt that many members, relying on the accuracy of the gentleman's statements, were relieved from ethical difficulties which would otherwise have prevented their voting for the resolution. The speech, though not delivered in full, was printed in the Globe from manuscript elaborately prepared, and was directed to the defense of his proposed amendment which I have already quoted. He offers what he calls three "reasons" in support of his proposition. His second and third are surely negative arguments, if arguments at all, and amount substantially to this: that as the Constitution does not, and Congress cannot confer upon the States the power to tax the bonds of the United States, and as he and those who agree with him have hitherto been defeated in their attempts to levy a direct tax of one per cent. on the capital of the public debt, there is no other method of reaching their object except the one now proposed, namely: to levy a direct tax on the interest of the public debt by declaring that the Government will hereafter pay but ninety per cent. of the interest it has promised to pay.

The first and only positive one of his three "reasons" is that "it is the English precedent." This statement is most surprising. Doubtless many members were gratified to hear it; but I know of but one who indorsed it as true. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in speaking of the Cobb resolution a few days after, said:

"The tax which the resolution proposes is the same as the English Government impose on its bonds."

That a gentleman in the heat of debate or without reflection should make such a statement would not be remarkable. But the gentleman from Maine undertook to speak by authority, giving quotations from the English statutes, and citations from financial history. So fully does he assume the responsibility in the light of history and the law that he has arranged his summary of the subject under five separate heads, and has made his assertion as if with the full assurance of knowledge.

After a careful examination of the question I am compelled to say that I have never seen so many misconceptions and perversions of so important a subject crowded into the same space. That I may do the gentleman no injustice I quote his words:

"The income statute of 5 Victoria is very elaborate, occupying a hundred and twenty pages, with minute details of different subjects of taxations and modes of collection.

"Schedule B provides that upon incomes from landed estates—and from this source some of the largest English incomes are derived—there shall be levied two and a half pence upon every twenty shillings of value.

"Schedule C is as follows:

"Upon all profits arising from annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities payable to any person, body, politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of any public revenue, there shall be charged yearly for every twenty shillings of the amount thereof the sum of seven pence, without deduction."

After stating the various rates of the tax at different times, he quotes section twenty-four, and citing subsequent sections of the same act—which provides that the Banks of England and of Ireland, the South Sea and East India Companies, and the commissioners for the reduction of the public debt shall be commissioners for assessing and charging the duties levied under schedule C—he continues:

"The effect of these English statutes is:

"1. A larger tax is assessed upon the holders of property in the public debt than upon the holders of landed estates.

"2. Every holder of the debt, whether resident in Great Britain or not, is assessed.

"3. As a portion of the public debt of England is in terminable annuities, to that extent the principal of the debt is taxed, and that whether the holder resides in Great Britain or abroad. Leon Levi, one of the most eminent of English writers on finance, mentions this speciality of British taxation.

"4. As the payment of the interest of the debt is intrusted to the Banks of England and Ireland, the East India and the South Sea Companies, and the commissioners for the reduction of the debt, the effect of putting this tax into their hands to assess and collect is nearly the same as it would be in our case to deduct it from the coupons. I have, in my amendment, followed the idea of the British statute and charged the Treasurer with these duties.

"5. Schedule C provides for payment of tax 'without deduction.' In case of other property it is provided by the statute that income up to a certain amount is not taxed. In our case all incomes under $1,000 are not taxed. The English limit is somewhat less.

"It is evident that my proposition is clearly within the English example."

The gentleman owes it to the House and to the country to explain why he drew the authority for his statements from the statute of 5 and 6 Victoria, a statute passed in 1842, and by its terms to continue in force but three years; and which, with the exception of some of the administrative sections, was repealed fifteen years ago. The very passage which the gentleman quotes in reference to the taxation of interest on the public debt is not now, and has not been, the law of England for fifteen years.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will allow me, Sir Robert Peel's law of 1842 took this schedule from Pitt's law of 1803. Gladstone subsequently adopted the same schedule. He amended the income law, but it was in particulars I did not comment upon. Consequently the statements I quoted from Peel's law, and which were also in Gladstone's law, were properly quoted because they are to-day the income law of Great Britain. The fact is the law of 1842 is the income law that is usually quoted, unless as to the few particulars in which it was changed by Gladstone's law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not linger on this point only to repeat what I have already said, that the very section which the gentleman quoted was repealed fifteen years ago, and except some of the administrative sections Gladstone's law of 1853 has been the basis of all subsequent legislation on the subject. But against the gentleman's statements I bring a far more serious charge than that of quoting a dead law. He has utterly misrepresented the law which he attempts to quote.

1. To prove his assertion, that a larger tax is assessed on holders of property in the public debt than on holders of landed estates, he asserts that schedule B taxes income on landed estates only two and one half pence in the pound; while schedule C taxes interest on the public debt seven pence in the pound.

On the very page of the statute from which he quoted stood in plain print the following:

"Schedule A. For all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or heritages in Great Britain, there shall be charged yearly, in respect to the property thereof, for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof, the sum of sevenpence."

He utterly misrepresented schedule B, which if quoted would be fatal to his case, and he quoted schedule C in full, thus giving the appearance of accuracy to his statement.

Schedule B levies a tax, not on the ownership, but on the occupation of land—on the annual profits of the tenant farmer, over and above the rent he pays.

There are five schedules in the English income tax, and the profits arising under all are taxed, and have always been taxed, at the same rate, except those under schedule B, which are placed at a less rate, as a favor to laboring men, the renters and farmers of land.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would ask the gentleman how it would help the poor man who rented land to tax the rent that went into the owner's pocket?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not see that the gentleman's question is pertinent to the subject.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How would it help the poor man?

Mr. GARFIELD. The farmers, the laboring men were taxed only half as much on the profits of their labor as the owners of the land were taxed on their profits from rent, and thus the poor man was helped. A difference was made between rents in Scotland and in England because of the difference in the mode of charging. In one of the countries the landlords had to pay the tax, and in the other the tenant. For that reason a difference was made between the Scottish and English farmers. But the gentleman from Maine quotes the Scottish tax under schedule B, omitting the English, which was one penny in the pound higher.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will allow me a moment. The English law always has been not only an income-tax law alone, but a property and income tax. That is the style of it, "property and income." I was discussing the income part. That part contained four schedules, beginning with schedule B. The first schedule that the gentleman speaks of now is the property schedule, and is a tax on the value of the land, somewhat similar to our real estate tax of 1861. But by our Constitution we can have no such property tax as the English, because with us it must be levied in proportion to the population.

I spoke also of the amount of these income taxes. Let me say that the largest income returned under any one single item under Peel's law was derived from this very schedule B. My statement was not about owners of land, but simply of holders of land. The holders of land hold it by long leases, and are one class of people, and the owners of the land who are taxed by rack-rent are another class, and on them the real estate tax is charged. That was the reason why I mentioned schedule B and not schedule A.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend, I fear, has not helped his case by what he has just said. In the first place, he is mistaken in supposing that schedule A is not an income tax, but a tax on property. It is no property tax. I will read from the language of the statute schedule A:

"For all lands, tenements, &c., there shall be charged yearly, in respect of the property thereof, for every twenty shillings of annual value thereof, the sum of sevenpence."

The tax is levied on the annual value, the rental value, the annual income arising out of it. It is an income tax throughout; a tax on income, whether arising from property or business, capital or labor. In the early years of the tax there were no subdivisions at all, and these schedules were introduced to enable the assessors to ascertain more certainly the amount of incomes in the kingdom.

Mr. PIKE. I would ask the gentleman whether that schedule A, so far as it is a land tax, is not a tax by rack-rent?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. PIKE. I say that the English authorities everywhere specify it as a tax by rack-rent.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is quite mistaken. If an owner rents his land his income from it is estimated on the rental value, but if he farms his own land he is taxed under schedule A according to an assessment made on its annual value, and he is also taxed under schedule B for the profit he makes from farming it himself. It is the income in both cases, which bears the tax. Under schedule A income from real estate is taxed. Under schedule B income from farm labor.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me? I know he desires to state the case fairly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Most certainly I do.

Mr. PIKE. He speaks of schedule A as if it was one item. Schedule B is one item, but schedule A contains fifty-four different items. Among those items are mortgages on houses, lands, &c., railways, canals, coal mines, fisheries, iron works, and other items of that sort, making fifty-four different items that go to make up the aggregate of schedule A.

Mr. GARFIELD. That makes the case all the stronger, and the gentleman himself exhibits the fact that the fifty-four items are items of landed property, real estate, and the tax is levied, as I have shown, not on the property, but on the annual income from it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Railroads and canals.

Mr. PIKE. Schedule B, under Peel's act, yielded £46,769,000, and the highest item in schedule A was £45,750,000. I quote from Senior's Income Tax Law.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's figures cannot possibly be correct, for I have before me the full official records of the assessment and product of the income tax from 1798 down to 1863. I will quote from it in a moment.

The gentleman refers to schedule B as the source of some of the largest English incomes. In this he is greatly mistaken. Nearly two thirds of all who are assessed under it are exempted by reason of their small incomes. Levi, in his work on taxation, (page 151,) says:

"Of nearly seven hundred thousand persons assessed under this schedule [B] only about two hundred and eighty thousand were charged."

This shows clearly that the incomes under schedule B are those of small farmers, and not the "largest English incomes," as the gentleman supposes.

Mr. PIKE. I did not say the largest single individual income, but the largest income in the gross.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's statement is incorrect in either case, whether applied to individual incomes or to the total amount of incomes arising under this schedule.

In Sir Morton Peto's work on taxation, page 45, he states in tabular form the whole amount assessed under the five schedules of the income tax laws in 1861:

The amount under schedule A is.....	£131,680,497
Under schedule B.....	33,128,236

From a still later English work (Noble's Fiscal Legislation, p. 152) I find that British incomes, exclusive of Ireland, on which taxes were assessed, under the different schedules, in 1863, were as follows:

A. Ownership of land.....	£126,061,575
B. Occupation of land.....	16,052,671
C. Dividends.....	29,528,215
D. Trades and professions.....	93,322,564
E. Salaries, pensions, &c.....	19,463,635

£234,428,560

From this it will be seen that the incomes under schedule B amount to but one-eighth as much as those under schedule A, where the great incomes are found, and that schedule B is the smallest of the five.

2. The gentleman asserts that though under all the other schedules, incomes below a certain amount are wholly exempt from taxation, yet on incomes arising under schedule C the tax must be paid without deduction. In answer to this statement I affirm that such is not now and never was the law of England. The very act to which the gentleman appeals provided that incomes less than £150 shall be wholly exempt from the tax; and if any part of the tax on such an income has been paid it shall be refunded. Here is the passage from his own authority, Statute 5 and 6 Victoria:

"SEC. 163. That any person charged or chargeable to the duties granted by this act, either by assessment or deduction from any rent annuity or other annual payment to which he may be entitled, who shall prove before the commissioners for general purposes, in the manner hereinafter mentioned, that the aggregate annual amount of his income, estimated according to the several rules and directions of this act, is less than one hundred and fifty pounds shall be exempted from the said duties, and shall be entitled to be repaid the amount of all deductions or repayments on account thereof in the manner hereinafter directed," &c.

Under that law, when holders of the public funds received their interest, the bank as the fiscal agent of the Government, withheld the amount of the income tax without deduction; but, on making proof to the commissioners of the inland revenue that his income, from all sources, was less than £150, the fundholder was paid the full amount which had been withheld by the bank. The gentleman has evidently confounded "deduction" with "exemption," for he speaks as though no exemption whatever was made under schedule C. In addition to the exemption of all incomes under £150, there were wholly exempted from taxation under that schedule the profits accruing to six classes of persons: 1, friendly societies; 2, saving's banks; 3, charitable institutions; 4, commissioners of the public debt; 5, the queen; 6, ministers from foreign countries. (See Statute 5 and 6 Victoria, section eighty-eight.) The words "without deduction" prohibited only the bank, not the commissioners of revenue, from making the deduction. In the statute of 16 and 17 Victoria (1853) these words are omitted, because that law provided that the commissioners might furnish the bank with a list of fundholders whose incomes were entitled to exemption, and from such the bank should withhold no part of the interest.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a quotation to sustain my views?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PIKE. Pitt's law of 1803 levied a tax of five per cent. It was subsequently raised in 1806 to ten per cent., and it was collected in exactly the way the gentleman says no tax ever was collected. That is, it was collected at the bank. And more than that, under schedule C, it was collected in full, and no exemption was allowed; exactly as I have stated. And under schedule D all incomes from fifty up to one hundred and fifty pounds were exempted. But the exemptions were limited to profits derived from "trades, professions, and offices." Thus the incomes from the debt were collected in full, while the incomes from other sources have exemptions to a certain extent. I quote now from Senior's Income Tax Law, page 80.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, the gentleman has done precisely what I suspected; he has utterly confounded the words deduction and exemption, for I see that he uses them interchangeably.

Mr. PIKE. I quoted the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I admit the law says "without deduction;" but it does not say "without exemption;" and therein lies the difference between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. PIKE. Let me read the very language.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will be kind enough to permit me to finish my statement. In a subsequent section (section eighty-eight) of the same statute, there are five exemptions under schedule C, which I have already quoted, and this proves beyond controversy that the words "without deduction" do not mean "without exemption." From the very volume which the gentleman holds in his hand, (Senior's Income Tax Law,) I can show him an instance cited to illustrate the law in which a part of a dividend on the public funds withheld by the bank was repaid to the citizen when he made proof that his income from all sources was less than the amount exempted by law. I think I pointed the case out to the gentleman a few days ago in the volume now in his hand.

Mr. PIKE. That is under another law.

Mr. GARFIELD. From the beginning of the English income tax down to the present day every man has been repaid, if he came under the exemption clause, for all moneys taken or withheld by the bank.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. Now, let me read what were the provisions of the English law.

"Up to this time exemption had been granted on incomes from realized property under sixty pounds a year. This was now, with few exceptions, repealed; and entire exemption was limited to incomes under fifty pounds a year in the whole; while a graduated scale was imposed upon incomes between fifty pounds and one hundred and fifty pounds a year, but limited to profits derived from trades, professions and offices. An official publication of the time explains the reasons for this alteration as well as some others effected about the same period."

The gentleman will see that I was entirely right, and he entirely wrong.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is manifestly a commentary, not a law, that the gentleman reads. What is the date of the law to which he refers?

Mr. PIKE. It is Pitt's income law.

Mr. GARFIELD. What year? There are several of Pitt's laws, extending from 1798 to 1816. If the gentleman has found an income law passed in the early years of that period, when the banks did not collect any part of the tax, his citation is fatal to the position he is attempting to establish.

Mr. PIKE. This was the law for ten years.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken. I cannot yield further now.

I proceed to notice another statement in the gentleman's printed speech.

3. He asserts that the principal of the British debt is taxed in so far as it consists of terminable annuities; and cites as proof the eminent authority of Leon Levi. This statement is more likely to mislead than any other in his speech, for it is likely to convey the impression by insinuation that while we refuse to tax the interest on our debt the British Government tax both the interest and principal of theirs. Now, I deny in toto that the capital of debt as such is taxed, or ever was taxed. Indeed, the gentleman does not assert, and I am sure he will not assert, that it is taxed as capital, but the whole drift of his statement insinuates it. The only ground on which he bases his assertion is that a terminable annuity is a debt, a part of the capital of which is virtually refunded to the holder each year, in the form of interest, and as the Government taxes the interest of such annuities at the same rate as the interest of perpetual annuities are taxed, it virtually amounts to a tax on the capital of terminable annuities. This statement of the case disposes of the gentleman's suggestion. It is, after all, the interest, and the interest alone that is taxed as a part of British incomes. From whatever source, in whatever manner the interest arises it is not taxed until it ceases to be capital and takes the form of interest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman state again, if it will not be too much trouble to him, what is a terminable annuity, as he understands it?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a form of English indebtedness from which the holder receives annually for a limited period, a larger sum than he would receive from a perpetual annuity, which brings him only three per cent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The same difference there would be here between a three per cent. bond and a six per cent. bond.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not the same difference, for one terminates altogether in a given time, while the other is perpetual. And the argument which the gentleman attempts to make is this: that a part of the capital is returned to the holder in the annual payment, and therefore the capital is taxed. My reply is that, strictly speaking, there is no capital at all in a terminable annuity. It is all income, and is taxed only as income. In support of this view of the case I refer to a report published in 1861 by Mr. Lowe, one of the ablest members of the House of Commons. That the tax on terminable annuities is one of the inequalities in the practical operation of the English law no one will deny. For twenty years English statesmanship has been baffled in the attempt to remedy this defect. In 1851 and 1852 a committee of the House of Commons sat for many months and printed a thousand pages of evidence on the working of the tax. Another committee in 1861, after a similar examination, reported a great mass of evidence. One of the chief objects of these investigations was to devise a plan by which this very inequality might be obviated. But both commissions failed to agree upon any plan, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer frankly confessed that with all the light thus thrown upon the subject, he saw no practicable method of curing the defect. Levi, whom the gentleman quotes, mentions the inequality of the tax when applied to the interest of terminable annuities, not to approve, but to denounce it; and he denounces it because in its effects it approaches so nearly a tax on capital. But in fact and in law it is no more a tax on capital than the tax which the States now levy on the shares of our national banks is a tax on the United States bonds, in which the capital of the banks is mainly invested. The principle involved in both these cases is precisely the same, and was clearly set forth by our Supreme Court in the case of Van Allen vs. The Assessors, (8 Wallace, 583-84) where it is held that a tax on the shares is not a tax on the capital of the bank; that the shares, though based on bonds which cannot be taxed by municipal authority, are a species of property distinct from the bonds, having many functions and uses which the bonds have not.

So with terminable annuities. Whatever elements may compose the interest arising from them, it is only when the annual proceeds from them assume the form of interest that the income tax applies to them. It is, therefore, not true, either in law or in fact, that the English Government taxes the principal of its debt.

Before leaving this point, in order to show to what desperate straits the gentlemen are reduced in their effort to find a precedent for taxing the principal of our debt, I will state that only a small portion of the British debt is in terminable annuities. The commission of 1861 stated the whole amount did not exceed £10,000,000, while the British debt was nearly seven hundred and ninety million pounds.

The gentleman asserts that every holder of the British funds, whether citizen or foreigner, is taxed, and hence concludes that we ought to tax the foreign holders of our bonds. There is just enough truth in this statement to make it dangerous, but not enough to make it true. From 1798 to 1842 every income-tax law of England contained a clause specially exempting from taxation all income from public funds in the hands of foreigners. The law, as revived in 1842 by Sir Robert Peel, placed the collection of the taxes under schedule B in the hands of the directors of the Bank of England and a few other corporations, and required them when paying dividends on the funds to withhold for the Government seven pence in the pound, the amount of the income tax. This plan was adopted because the tax would thus be more certainly collected. During the debate on the bill objection was made that this plan would not exempt the foreign holder of the funds; but it was answered that to exempt them would open the door to frauds, and that there were so few foreign holders as not to warrant a change in the whole plan for that reason. Peel said that all the tax which would be collected from foreign holders would not amount to more than ten or twenty thousand pounds.

England has long been a lender, not a borrower, of money; has no foreign loan, and though the taxation of income from the debt in the hands of foreigners is hardly a practical question with her, yet her leading statesmen strongly condemn it. While speaking on this very subject in 1853, Mr. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

"It has been a popular doctrine to tax the foreigner, but I think that no person in this House would wish to tax the foreigner in this particular form. It has been a long-contested question with respect to income tax in England whether the foreigner is not entitled to exemption altogether. The late Sir Robert Peel subjected him to equal taxation in 1842; but even that proposition was strongly resisted, and I think every member of this House will agree that it would be very impolitic to lay an exceptional tax of this kind upon the foreigner."—Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, vol. 125, p. 1878.

I am in some doubt as to what the English law now is; but there is a citizen of this place who has held English funds within the last year, and who states that he was exempted from the tax on furnishing evidence that he was not a British subject.

Mr. PIKE. Who is the man?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Corcoran, of this city.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not willing thus to impeach the veracity of a gentleman. Mr. Corcoran said what I have just stated in answer to the direct question of a leading member of the House.

Mr. PIKE. I may perhaps explain that matter about Mr. Corcoran. There are five exemptions in this case of incomes; and the fifth is the stock belonging to "her majesty or the foreign ministers resident in Great Britain." It may be that Mr. Corcoran acted as minister resident of the rebel confederacy when he was there, and thus got an exemption.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the gentleman said there was no exemption under schedule C. He now admits there are five. But whatever the British law may be at the present time in regard to taxing foreigners, this will not be denied; that whenever the foreigner has been taxed under the income law he has had the same benefits of exemptions and deductions as a British subject. Even under Peel's law the foreigner was exempt when his income from British sources was less than £150. This English practice bears no analogy to the scheme proposed by the gentleman from Maine. To quote it as an argument is to confess the weakness of his position.

In answer, therefore, to the gentleman's assertions, I affirm:

1. That there is not now, and never has been, a law in England levying a tax on the principal of the public debt.

2. That the interest on the British debt is not now, and never was, taxed, except when it takes the form and becomes a part of a taxable income. Whenever there has been no income tax there has been no tax on the interest of the debt. Whenever there has been an income tax the interest arising from the debt has been taxed at the same rate, and only the same, as the income from lands, hereditaments, trades, professions, salaries, pensions, and every other source except from the occupation and farming of lands.

3. That all the rules of exemption which apply to other sources of income apply equally to income arising from the funds.

In short, that the interest of the debt is not taxed at all as such, but only when it forms a part of an income amounting to more than one hundred or one hundred and fifty pounds, or whatever the amount exempted by law may be. And, finally, that the propositions of the gentlemen from Maine, Massachusetts, and Indiana, which afterward, in substance, passed the House as the Cobb resolution, is not within the English precedent, nor within any precedent approved by civilized nations; but, if it becomes a law, will be a direct, palpable repudiation of $13,000,000 of the annual interest on our national debt, for the payment of which the faith of the nation has been pledged in the most solemn manner.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in his speech last evening alleged that our bonds were bought at a great discount, and are now at a premium, and therefore the bondholder could not complain if he should be taxed higher than the holders of other property. I desire to remind the gentleman that the English bonds were negotiated at a much greater discount than our own. A late English writer has shown that all the debt incurred from 1798 to 1815 was negotiated at a loss of nearly forty-three per cent., and that for every $100 of money received from loans during that period the debt was increased £173.

But for one illustrious fact Great Britain would have fallen half a century ago into the abyss of hopeless bankruptcy, of irretrievable financial ruin; but for one fact her greatness and glory would now exist only in history. That fact is this: that while she had borne, for a hundred years, a greater burden of debt and taxation than any other nation, she has kept her financial faith untarnished. This fact has enabled her, within the last fifty years, to reduce the total amount of her annual interest twenty-five per cent., while the principal of her debt has been reduced less than nine per cent. In 1817 her annual interest was almost thirty-four millions sterling. In 1866 it was less than twenty-six millions. She has been able to fund her debt again and again at a decreased rate of interest, and the records of Threadneedle street show that the British three per cent. consols have been during the last half century the standard stock of the world. Though the British debt is nearly fifty per cent. greater than ours, yet her annual interest in 1867 was ten per cent. less.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to in regard to the English precedent. Though the principles of political morality cannot be changed by any precedent, yet I admit that if the gentlemen had shown that the English tax law is framed on the same principle expressed in the Cobb resolution, it would be a very formidable argument in defense of that measure. These positive statements that it was so had a marked effect on the opinions of members of the House, and led them to assent to a proposition which I do not believe they will in-dorse after a full consideration of it.

I rejoice, sir, that the Committee of Ways and Means have responded to the order of the House in a manner which discloses in full the character of the proposition which these gentlemen desire to incorporate in the law. I sub-join their bill and report. On the 2d of July, Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

"The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution of the House instructing them to report without unnecessary delay a bill levying a tax of at least ten per cent. on the interest of the bonds of the United States, to be collected by the Secretary of the Treasury and such of his subordinates as may be charged with the duty of paying the interest on the bonded debt of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report and bill:

"The Committee of Ways and Means are opposed to the proposition embraced in this resolution, and report the bill only in obedience to the positive mandate of the House.

"In the argument made in the House in favor of the resolution, the English income-tax law was referred to and quoted. There is a law, corresponding to that English law, on the statute-books of this country, imposing a tax on incomes of five per cent., while the English tax is less than three per cent. But your committee have been unable to find in the statute-books of England, or any other civilized country, a law that could be regarded in any way as a precedent for the bill the House have instructed the committee to report, which, if enacted, will be simply a law providing for the payment of a rate of interest on the Government debt ten per cent. less than was agreed for, ten per cent. less than is stated in the bonds, and ten per cent. less than was pledged to be paid by the solemn enactment of Congress, when the money was required to carry on a war which threatened the life of the nation.

"The evil effects resulting to a nation, whether her national credit is guarded and protected, or whether by legislation of the character now proposed the confidence of all other civilized nations is forfeited, may not be felt or appreciated in times of peace; but the committee desire to call attention to the consequences that would follow the passage of a bill of the character now submitted, in case we should ever hereafter have occasion to use our credit for the purpose of providing means either to sustain ourselves at home or to defend ourselves in any collision with a foreign Power.

"The committee repeat, that in reporting this bill they act in obedience to the positive direction of the House and contrary to their own best judgment. They reserve to themselves their rights, as members of the House, to oppose in every possible way the adoption of a measure which they regard as hostile to the public interest and injurious to the national character."

The following is the bill, which full embodies the spirit of their instructions:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of interest hereafter due and payable on all bonds and other securities of the United States. To secure the collection of said tax, the amount of interest hereafter paid on any bonds or other securities of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent., shall be at the rate of only five and four tenths per cent.; and if bearing interest at the rate of five per cent., shall be at the rate of only four and five tenths per cent.; and if bearing interest at the rate of three per cent., shall be at the rate of only two and seven tenths per cent. per annum. No higher rate of interest than is herein prescribed shall be paid on any bond or other security of the United States now outstanding, or authorized to be issued, all conditions of any such bond or other security, and all laws and parts of laws to the contrary notwithstanding."

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in his speech last evening, that part concerning the report of the committee, charged them with going out of their way to discuss the British law, and said that the resolution sent to the Committee of Ways and Means was passed without debate, and under the previous question; and he asked, "What business had they to talk about the English example and the results of it? nobody raised that question." I will tell the gentleman why the committee discussed the English law. When the gentleman and his Democratic friends were carrying through the measure for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means he made a short speech of one sentence, although the previous question was pending, in which he declared that this was precisely the English method of taxing bonds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. That sentence I quoted from the Globe during the first ten minutes of my speech.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is not quoting it now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said rate.

Mr. GARFIELD. To show that the gentleman is mistaken I will read, if he will allow me, exactly what he said. I quote from the Globe of June 30, 1868:

"Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The tax which the resolution proposes is the same that the English Government imposes on its bonds."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is that fair? Read the question before it?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no question before it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will read:

"Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. PIKE called for the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest the tax on these bonds be made one hundred per cent. That will fill our Treasury still more rapidly."

"Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The tax which the resolution proposes is the same that the English government imposes on its bonds."

Now, I ask any gentleman present if this sentence refers to the rate; and if it refers to the rate is it true? If the explanation which the gentleman now gives of his remark be correct, then the other remark itself is not true, and he can take whichever horn of the dilemma he chooses.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. For a single moment. In 1806, first five per cent., and then raised to ten per cent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a most striking example of the gentleman's own sense of fair argument. Since 1806 there never was a ten per cent. income on British funds or on any other income. During the war with Napoleon a part of the time the British income tax was five per cent., and a part of the time it was ten per cent., but since that war it has never reached six per cent. It was less than six per cent. in the Crimean war when the tax was doubled. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts says in the Globe, from which I have quoted, "the tax which the resolution proposes is the same that the English Government imposes on its bonds." Not that they did impose on their bonds fifty years ago, but "the same the British Government imposes on its bonds now." I deny that the British Government now imposes or has imposed on the interest of its bonds for half a century, a tax of ten per cent.; and, as I have already said, the statement of the gentleman plainly declared that the Cobb resolution was in accordance with the English precedent, and that proposition I have utterly disproved.

I say again, after such a sentence as the gentleman uttered in the House, it was eminently proper for the Committee of Ways and Means to refer to whatever instructions they had in the case, whether in the terms of the resolution itself or in the remarks of those who advocated its passage. The committee brought in a report precisely in the spirit and almost in the words of the resolution. They were ordered to bring in without delay a bill to tax ten per cent. on the interest of the public bonds, and to require the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates to collect that tax. And the only argument made in favor of the resolution at the time was the declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts that it provided for taxing the interest on our bonds by the same method that the English Government taxes theirs. They took their instructions with the accompanying comment of the gentleman, and they brought in a bill in strict accordance with their instructions, that hereafter whenever the Government of the United States pays interest it shall withhold ten per cent.; that though it promised to pay six per cent. it should pay five and four tenths per cent.; in short, that it will pay but ninety per cent. of what was promised, any law, bond, or contract to the contrary notwithstanding. The country will thank the Committee of Ways and Means for the report with which they accompanied the bill, and I do not hesitate to declare that the proposition sent to the committee—though I cannot believe that the House so understood it—was a direct and palpable order to repudiate ten per cent. of the entire interest on our debt. We owe $130,000,000 of interest annually, and the resolution declares that $13,000,000 of it we will refuse to pay.

Mr. Chairman, I will cordially cooperate with any gentleman here in any honorable and proper effort to reduce the burden of taxation; but on no account and under no circumstances can I consent to such a measure as that resolution demands.

Mr. PIKE. Does the gentleman defend this remark of the Committee of Ways and Means in their report:

"In the argument made in the House in favor of the resolution, the English income-tax law was referred to and quoted. There is a law corresponding to that English law on the statute-books of this country, imposing a tax on incomes of five per cent., while the English tax is less than three per cent."

Does the gentleman say that that is correct in fact or in spirit or in results. I say it is neither correct in fact, in mode of collection, nor in results. It has not a kinship to correctness.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not gone into the special calculation made in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and am not responsible for its correctness; but according to my arithmetic, seven pence in the pound is less than three per cent. The Committee of Ways and Means takes the same view, but the gentleman seems to think otherwise.

Mr. PIKE. The tax by the English law is deducted from the payment of interest at the time it is made. Schedule C yielded during the Crimean war the sum of about nine million dollars in gold as a deduction from the amount of interest on the British debt; whereas our income tax is not assessed on a very large portion of our debt, there being large exemptions by the law. The whole amount owned by the banks is expressly excluded by the law, and we do not collect. I venture to say, after examination of the returns, $1,000,000, probably not $500,000, whereas Great Britain collected according to the returns £1,795,718 during the Crimean war. It is absurd to say or intimate that our tax is larger than the English, and it will be recollected that the interest on the English debt upon which the tax is levied is about ten millions less than our interest.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course I decline to go into the arithmetical argument of the Committee of Ways and Means, as that is entirely aside from the subject I am discussing. But I have never before heard it denied that our income law is modeled after the English law. I have shown that the Cobb-resolution is not; and I say again I am exceedingly glad that the Committee of Ways and Means have uncovered the not quite transparent humbug of that resolution, as I must be permitted to call it.

Mr. PIKE. By a humbug in which there is not a particle of truth.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is my belief, [laughter;] and I congratulate Congress that the humbug has not the support of truth, and that it only needs exposure to explode it.

And now, sir, allow me to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts endeavored last night very adroitly to change the proposition so as to make a new issue altogether. He said that the Committee of Ways and Means ought to have brought in an amendment to the income-tax law to provide for withholding the amount of income tax due on the interest arising from the bonds at the original source, but instead of that they had brought in a bill having no reference to the income law, but levying the tax directly on the interest of the bonds. Now, sir, I take this as a confession that the Cobb-resolution is not defensible, for I call the House to witness that not one of the gentlemen who spoke on the subject gave the least intimation that they were amending or offering a substitute for the income law. There was nothing in the resolution that had the least reference to the income tax. It was clearly a measure aside from and independent of the income law. The tax it contemplated would be in addition to the income tax. Now, I do not propose to allow this escape from the issue raised. The two propositions are totally unlike. So long as we tax the interest of the bonds as a part of the income of the citizens, no man can justly find fault. It is not a tax on the bonds, not even a tax on the interest as such, but only a tax on such part of the interest as takes the form and becomes part of a taxable income. So long as we place income from the bonds on the same basis with income from all other sources and tax by a uniform rule, subjecting all incomes to the same deductions; exemptions, and limitations, we are not only within the English precedent, but we are on safe ground of constitutional right, where justice may be done to tax-payers, and the public credit will not suffer.

Now, if the House thinks it best to double the income tax, let it be done. The holders of bonds cannot complain. Income from bonds should bear its equal proportion. The Constitution of the United States lays down two rules on the subject of taxation, namely: a direct tax on property must be levied by apportionment; an indirect tax must be levied by the rule of uniformity. It will not be claimed that our income tax is a direct tax—a tax on property; for it plainly falls under the rule of uniformity. But the tax proposed by the Cobb resolution is a tax on property—a special, exceptional tax, liable to measureless abuse. Should the principle prevail, to what extreme may it not be carried? It is now proposed to tax the interest of the bonds ten per cent. What will hinder the next Congress from making it twenty, forty, eighty, or any higher rate? Being exceptional it would directly hurt none but the public creditors. But under the wise provisions of the Constitution the rule of uniformity protects every class of citizens by making the protection of each the interest of all. The gentleman from Massachusetts was very energetic in his plea for equality of taxation, and quoted a passage from the Chicago platform on that subject, with the manifest purpose of making it apply to such a measure as he proposes. I suggest to the gentleman that he will find a much better text for his doctrines in the Democratic platform than he finds in ours. The language of Tammany Hall on this subject is explicit, and expresses in very vigorous terms the gentleman's ideas of taxation.

The language of their fourth article is as follows:

"Equal taxation of every species of property according to its real value, including Government bonds and other public securities."

This declaration must meet the hearty approval of the gentleman from Massachusetts. According to this doctrine the Democratic party are in favor of taxing equally all property, real and personal. Farms and bonds, wagons and billiard tables, wheat and whisky, bread and tobacco, all are to be subject to equal taxation according to their real value. Farms to bear less rate than whisky, potatoes no less than beer, corn no less than brandy, wheat no less than gin. All are to be taken together according to this new Democratic doctrine and subjected to a tax not levied as now by uniform rule, on the annual value of the income arising from it, but as a direct tax on the actual value of the articles themselves. This new definition of the meaning of equality ought to be entirely pleasing to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to inquire if the law under which the bonds were issued does not provide that they shall be exempt from taxation?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. The law declares them exempt from taxation by all State and municipal authorities. Now, if this Democratic resolution means that the bonds are to be subjected to a direct property tax, it must mean State taxation, and that is forbidden, not only in the law that created the bonds, but according to repeated decisions of the Supreme Court is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. If the resolution means that Congress ought to tax all farm and agricultural implements, all property, real and personal, according to its real value, the absurdity is so apparent as to need no comment. The established rule that the States levy direct taxes, and Congress indirect, would be utterly broken down. Now, Mr. Chairman, allow me to suggest that there are two ways of managing taxation and the public debt. One is to strike directly at the principal or interest of the bonds and greatly reduce their value for the sake of adding a little to the revenue. That seems to be the method of the gentleman from Massachusetts and his associates. For the sake of withholding $13,000,000 from the public creditors they would depreciate the value of every bond in the United States in existence. The bonds have already fallen an average of one per cent. since this resolution passed the House and threatened the country.

Mr. PIKE. Are they not to-day as high as they were before?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I have the exact quotation in to-day's paper, and they are more than one cent lower than they were before that resolution passed.

Mr. PIKE. In London?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; here. If the country fully believed that this ruinous policy would become the law the depreciation would be very great. For every cent of depreciation $21,000,000 are lost by our creditors, but not gained by us. The creditors lose the money and the nation loses credit. And under their system what would be our condition when we find it necessary to negotiate a loan? and that necessity is now almost upon us, for we have a bill pending to fund $1,800,000,000 of our debt. Nobody expects that we can pay as fast as the debt matures, but we shall be compelled to go into the market and negotiate new loans. Let this system of taxation be pursued; let another Congress put the tax at twenty per cent., another at forty per cent., and another at fifty per cent. or one hundred per cent.; let the principle be once adopted—the rate is only a question of discretion—and where will you be able to negotiate a loan except at the most ruinous sacrifice? Let such legislation as the gentleman urges here prevail, and can we look any man in the face and ask him to loan us money? If we do not keep faith to-day how can we expect to be trusted hereafter? I have said there are two methods of managing debt and taxation. One is that I have just been considering. The other advocated, not by the gentleman from Massachusetts nor in the Democratic platform, but in the platform adopted at Chicago, in which it is declared that—

"We denounce all forms of repudiation as national crime; and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the uttermost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted."

"It is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized, and reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit."

"The national debt, contracted as it has been for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period for redemption; and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can be honestly done."

"That the best policy to diminish our burden of debt is to so improve our credit that capitalists will seek to loan us money at lower rates of interest than we now pay, and must continue to pay so long as repudiation, partial or total, open or covert, is threatened or suspected."

I quote these declarations with feelings of pride and satisfaction. I am proud of that great party which, having saved the life of the nation by its valor, now declares its unalterable purpose to save, by its truth and devotion, what is still more precious, the faith and honor of the nation.

There was a declaration made by an old English gentleman in the days of Charles the Second which does honor to human nature. He said he was willing at any time to give his life for the good of his country, but he would not do a mean thing to save his country from ruin. So, sir, ought a citizen of the United States to feel in regard to our financial affairs. The people of the United States can afford to make any sacrifice for their country, and the history of the last war has proved their willingness; but the humblest citizen cannot afford to do a mean or dishonorable thing to save even this glorious Republic.

For my own part I will not consent to any act of dishonor. And I look upon this proposition—though I cannot think the gentleman meant it to be so—as having in itself the very essence of dishonor. I shall, therefore, to the utmost of my ability, resist it. Suppose that the credit of the United States were as good as the credit of Massachusetts. Only a few months ago that State negotiated a loan in London on terms so favorable as to put to shame our attempts at funding our debt. During the whole war her credit has been far better than ours. And how stand her old five per cent. bonds to-day? I hold in my hand the London Economist of a month ago, and I find the Massachusetts five per cent. bonds quoted at 89 and 90, while the ten-forty gold-bearing five per cent. United States bonds are 68½; a difference of twenty-one cents on the dollar. And why this great difference? Massachusetts has not only kept faith during all the trials of the war, but she has not sought technical grounds on which to escape from her obligations. She might have lightened the burden of her debt, as many other States did, by paying her interest in currency instead of in coin, as she could legally do under the legal-tender act. But she paid every debt in accordance with the letter and spirit of the contract. Her bonds exhibit the result. If the credit of the United States were as good as that of Massachusetts we could fund our whole debt at $400,000,000 less cost to the nation than we can fund it on our own credit. This example fully illustrates the two lines of financial policy.

Mr. STONE resumed the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. STONE. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is hardly time in five minutes to say much on a subject of this magnitude and complexity, but I will try to state a few points. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for his compliment to the credit and stability of Massachusetts. She deserves it all and more. I only wish I could appropriate it to my State upon the ground it is put; but the gentleman really does not seem clearly to understand the subject upon which he speaks, for he must know that the element of time, other things being equal, enters largely into the value of a bond, Government security. The Massachusetts bonds of which he speaks have twenty years to run, while the United States bonds have only five years to run, at the option of the Government. If you were to settle your debt to-day in form of terminable annuities or terminable annuities of four per cent. on long time you could sell them in the markets of the world for more than the six per cent. bonds of Massachusetts. It is the length of time the bond has to run that gives value to it for an investment. That the gentleman does not seem to appreciate, if he understands it.

Another thing. The gentleman undertook to tell the committee that Great Britain does not take the principal of her debt when she taxes the dividends of her terminable annuities, and thus shows that he knows no more about that subject than he does about the Choctaw language.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is complimentary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I asked the gentleman twice over what a terminable annuity is, and he failed to explain it to us. Now, what is a terminable annuity? For instance, a party loans to the Government $1,000, or any other sum, for ten, twenty, forty, or one hundred years, and agrees to receive the whole of it back in annual, semi-annual, or quarterly payments, with interest on each payment. So that he gets the whole principal, and at the end of the limit or term, say ten years, the whole interest in the installments. Now, if you tax the whole installments of those annuities, you tax the principal as well as the interest. This is very plain.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to say—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield when I have only five minutes. Give me an hour, and I will allow everybody to ask anything or say anything. I am ready to meet all comers on this question if you will only allow me the time.

The gentleman from Ohio in his speech has not touched what are really the three points of my argument. The first question at issue is, do the English tax the income of their public debt? The gentleman does not deny that they do; and they tax it on the interest paid, or as we say on the coupon, as we propose to tax the income of our bonds; they tax it at the Bank of England where the interest is paid. Second, do they pay the amount of the interest due, or the "coupon," without any deduction? They do not. And in the case mentioned by the gentleman where the deduction was returned, Mr. Corcoran probably swore himself in as coming under the £150 income clause. Third, the gentleman said to me when the resolution was before the House, "You might as well take one hundred per cent. of the interest on the debt." I said, we propose to take no more in the form of taxation than England has imposed on the income of her public debt. I admit she does not do it to-day; but she has imposed ten per cent. tax on her public debt when it was necessary in time of war; and the gentleman from Ohio does not deny it. Yet he says her financial honor is untarnished, while admitting that she took from her public creditors ten per cent. in the form of interest. We ask no more, we propose nothing different, but we are denounced as repudiators for doing precisely what England has done with untarnished financial honor.

What was another point at issue? Whether England taxed foreigners? The gentleman admits that she has taxed and does tax foreigners by her laws, and how does he attempt to answer that? By bringing before us what Mr. Gladstone said in a certain debate. Why, sir, that is just the same as if any one should bring forward what was said by the gentlemen of the minority here, as showing what law this House enacts.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Gladstone was Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, and carried his bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He did not carry his bill on that point. There is no such provision on the British statute-book. The gentleman from Ohio attempts to show what the law is by reading what somebody said the law ought to be!

Mr. PIKE. The law was not changed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman says that for thirty-four years, from 1817 to 1842, there was no income tax in Great Britain on foreigners. I agree that there was not. But during the same time there was no income tax on anybody. So in this country, from 1798 down to 1864, there was no income tax on foreigners. Why? Because there was no income tax on anybody.

A single word further, and I shall be done. In all that the gentleman has said he has not undertaken to answer a single argument of mine. He has dealt with the argument of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE] who is abundantly able to take care of himself. I established three points which the gentleman has not touched. First, a ten per cent. income tax has been imposed by England on her bonds, which has been collected as if off the coupon when the interest was paid. Second, she has taxed the principal of her debt where it was in the shape of terminable annuities. Third, she has taxed foreigners, and she does tax them by her laws to-day. That is all and more than all I have proposed shall be done by us.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. STONE] to give way for three minutes longer, that I may make a brief reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STONE. I will do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, if I do not understand what I am talking about any more than I understand Choctaw, I trust I shall never adopt the manners of a Choctaw in my treatment of an opponent in debate. The gentleman first charges that I do not know what a terminable annuity is, and then gives precisely the definition which I gave.

In the next place, he declares, in his elegant style, that "the gentleman from Ohio does not know that time to run makes the difference of value between the Massachusetts bonds and the bonds of the United States," and time, in his understanding of the matter, is of more consequence than rate of interest. Now, I cannot tell at this moment how much time the old Massachusetts five per cent. loan has to run, though my impression is that loan has not many years to run.

I call the gentleman's attention to this quotation of time as exhibited in two kinds of United States bonds. The six per cent. bonds of 1881, twenty-year bonds, having yet thirteen years to run, are to-day quoted at one hundred and thirteen. The five-twenty coupon bonds of 1862, bearing the same rate of interest, and which became redeemable last year, and may be paid any day the Government pleases—the time has gone, the Government may redeem them to-morrow—those bonds are to-day quoted at one hundred and twelve and three quarters, only one quarter of one per cent. less than bonds that have thirteen full years to run. This exhibits the influence of time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What loan is that?

Mr. GARFIELD. Five-twenty coupon bonds of 1862. They are issued redeemable in five years and payable after twenty.

The gentleman says I have not touched his positions; that I have admitted all he claims. I appeal to the House whether I have not proven from the records that he has utterly misconstrued and misrepresented English law and history. And I have established the fact that the interest on the English debt is taxed as income, and only as income, just as our bonds are now taxed as income; and that the scheme of the gentleman is not according to the English precedent, nor any precedent approved by civilized nations.

I am content with the record between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, I think those who have listened to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio in reply to what I said in my remarks of June 26, must have come to the conclusion that I was correct. The gentleman has had a month to examine the subject. He has evidently been acting in conjunction with the Committee of Ways and Means, and although what I said occupied but half a column of the Globe, he comes in with an hour's speech, carefully prepared, to refute my positions, and now I am quite willing to submit the case to the country as he has thus made it up.

I gave the English statute under which the debt was taxed, and stated the amount of the various taxations, none of which are denied. What, then, are the questions at issue between us? The first, as I understand it, is whether the English discriminate against the debt as compared with some other interests. Is that so?

TAX ON HOLDERS OF LAND.

I gave in my remarks the gist of schedule B of the English income tax law. It is well known that Pitt divided the "property and income tax" among five schedules. The first pertained to property in land and other things pertaining more or less directly to the realty; the second to the occupants of land or land-holders; the third to the public securities; fourth, incomes from trade, &c.; and fifth, to incomes from offices. The first schedule is the "property tax," and so far as relates to ownership of land can have no duplicate with us, because direct taxes upon land according to our Constitution must be assessed in proportion to population. The other four schedules could all be duplicated here, and have been in great measure, and it was of those that I spoke in the remarks which have been replied to.

These five schedules of Pitt have never been changed, and to-day they are part and parcel of the law. In 1798 Pitt laid his first income tax. It was similar to ours, and called upon the subjects of the kingdom to make returns according to the consciences just as our law does. But the law was greatly evaded. An official publication at the time says:

"It is notorious that persons in easy circumstances, nay, even in apparent affluence, have returned their income under sixty pounds, although their annual expenditures have been treble that sum. The incomes of whole parishes have been swept away by this fraud."

For this reason a change was made in the mode of collecting. The division into schedules was made, and the tax collected "at the sources." The tax on land, so far as the realty was concerned, was collected under schedule A and at rack-rent, and the occupiers of the land, the farmers, were taxed under schedule B and at another rate. When I spoke of the holders of the land as taxed under schedule B I made a distinction which has existed in the English law for over sixty years. And anybody at all familiar with England knows that the great body of the land is under lease, that large sums are paid for hire, and that many of these landholders are possessed of large means.

Sir Robert Peel reenacted the income law in 1842; and with it the Pitt schedules.

Schedule B, under Peel's income tax, returned a taxable income of £46,769,915, and the whole income of the kingdom was only £251,013,003. It may be determined from this whether I exaggerated the importance of this schedule. Still it was taxed only one half of the taxation that by the same law was put upon the income of the public debt, which that year returned an income of £27,909,793. Why was this? It was because Parliament thought the public good required them to discriminate in favor of the occupiers of the land as compared with the holders of the debt. I take my figures from Senior's Income-Tax Law, published in London in 1853.

I say, then, my first point is made out that holders or occupants of land were and are favored in England, and that the income from this source has been very large, among the largest in the whole range of taxation.

ARE FOREIGNERS TAXED?

The second question is, whether foreigners are assessed or not. I gave the law on the subject in stating they were assessed. The gentleman from Ohio has ransacked the whole library bearing upon the subject. He has examined Pitt's, Peel's, and Gladstone's Laws, and the Debates in Parliament, and still has found no law or authority for their exemption. The nearest he has come to it is some remarks of Gladstone's, commenting upon Peel's law as if it assessed foreigners, and objecting to it on that account.

The law itself assesses everybody, with five exceptions: 1, funds belonging to friendly societies; 2, funds belonging to savings-banks; 3, funds belonging to charitable institutions; 4, funds belonging to the lord high treasurer of England and commissioners of public debt; 5, funds belonging to her majesty and to foreign ministers resident in Great Britain.

All others owning in the British funds were assessed.

Mr. Gladstone amended Peel's law in 1853, after it had been in operation eleven years; but he made no change either in the schedules or in their five exceptions. He allowed both to stand. Indeed, for all the general purposes of taxation the law of 1842 is the law to-day, and it was for that reason I referred to it rather than to the amendments made by

Mr. Gladstone. It may be quite true that Mr. Gladstone did not favor the proposition to tax foreigners, but Parliament did favor it; or else the law would have been changed.

It would be strange should Congress tax those who took our bonds when taking them was esteemed a patriotic duty, and let slip, acquit of taxation, the bankers of Threadneedle street, or the Bourse, or at Frankfurt, knowing very well, as we do, that they did not buy until it was reckoned a sure thing that the Republic would live and pay. None of them took our bonds until after Vicksburg and Gettysburg. Why should they have the preference over our own home patriots? Why not apply the English rule to them?

TAXATION OF PRINCIPAL OF DEBT.

I said that the principal of the debt, so far as pertained to terminable annuities, was assessed. Leon Levi said so. The gentleman from Ohio does not deny it, but says Levi states that in his opinion taxation is wrong. A committee of Parliament examined the subject, under the lead of Mr. Joseph Hume, and found no remedy for this and other inequalities of taxation, and so the law stands. The amount is not large, but it is too plain to need argument that when the same tax is assessed on terminable as upon interminable annuities, the principal of the debt must be taxed.

EXEMPTIONS.

The English law, like ours, has varied considerably as to exemptions. For a portion of the time there have been no exemptions so far as regards the public debt. Pitt's income law provided that incomes from certain sources should be favored. Senior, page 8, says:

"Entire exemption was limited to incomes under fifty pounds a year in the whole, while a graduated scale was imposed upon incomes between fifty and one hundred and fifty pounds a year, but limited to profits derived from trades, professions, and offices."

Thus the income from the public debt was again discriminated against. The present rule, as I understand it, is to assess all, and then upon proof shown that the person owning in the funds has no income over the prescribed amount, a repayment is made. I should have no objection to a similar course here.

The other statement that I made as to the manner of collecting this tax at the bank is not controverted. Mr. Robert Lowe, the distinguished member of Parliament, says:

"There is no doubt, a great inequality in the present income tax. Schedule A is collected at the hands of the tenant, and schedules C and E at the bank. The income assessed is therefore identical with the income received. But schedule D depends on the consciences of the tax-payer, who often, it is to be feared, returns hundreds instead of thousands, and who is certain to decide any question that he can persuade himself to think doubtful in his own favor. Thus the committee have been informed by Mr. Till that a penny in the pound income tax produces in the city of London £50,000, and that it produced just as much twelve years ago."

These are all the points controverted between the gentleman from Ohio and myself, and I submit that my positions are maintained by the best authorities. I have shown that Parliament has constantly discriminated in its taxation against the holders in the funds as compared with others paying an income tax, and I challenge an instance where they discriminate in favor of such holders. How is it with us?

OUR INCOME LAW.

The Committee of Ways and Means, in its extraordinary report, say:

"In the agreement made in the House in favor of the resolution, the English income-tax law was referred to and quoted. There is a law corresponding to that law on the statute-books of this country, imposing a tax on incomes of five per cent. while the English law is less than three per cent."

I asked the gentleman from Ohio whether, in his commendation of the committee, he was prepared to maintain the truth of this statement? But he declined doing so. He acted wisely in so declining.

The income-tax law of this country is unlike the English in three vital particulars.

1. The English tax is assessed and collected at the bank counter; in other words, deducted from the payment of interest. Ours is made from returns prepared according to the elastic consciences of those making them.

2. No corporation in this country makes an income return that I ever heard of. A large amount of bonds are held by banks that make no income return at all and so escape this tax, while in England every bank and other corporation—except those I have enumerated—pays the tax whenever it receives its interest. The Bank of England always pays income tax on the large amount of Government securities it holds while our banks are specially exempt.

3. In the amount of tax actually received. The committee would evidently have the country believe that we actually assessed our securities more heavily through the income tax than the English do theirs through their income tax. How is it?

We began in 1862 by assessing the public debt one and one half per cent. on the interest, and that tax was collected for two years, the years 1862 and 1863. The public debt for July 1, 1862, was $514,211,371; and July 1, 1863, it was $1,098,793,181. The full tax on the interest in 1862 was $462,790; and for the year 1863 it was $1,088,943, and the amount actually paid was in 1862 the sum of $75,373, and in 1863 the sum of $193,402; in the first case in the flush of patriotism they paid one sixth as much as they ought to pay, but grown more wary the next year they paid but about one ninth of what they ought to pay.

In the year 1864 the tax on the debt was just the same as on other incomes and no separate return kept, so that we are without official data; but as our bonded debt is but about double what it was in July, 1863, it would be a stretch of imagination to suppose we receive now anything like $1,000,000 from this source. It is not probable that we receive $500,000 in currency from the whole of this income tax on the public debt which the Committee of Ways and Means would have the country believe was larger than the English; and the amount of interest we pay is about one hundred and thirty million dollars yearly. It is nearly ten million dollars more than the English interest, and yet schedule C, according to the English return, yielded as follows; and in order that there may be no mistake about schedule C, I give its language as found in the statute-book:

"Schedule C.

"Upon all profits arising from annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities payable to any person, body, or politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of any public revenue, there shall be charged yearly for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof the sum of seven pence without deduction."—Statutes-at-Large, 5 and 6 Victoria, p. 343.

I say this schedule C yielded as follows:

In 1843.....	£812,982
In 1847.....	739,630
In 1850.....	744,925
In 1857.....	1,795,718
In 1865.....	735,552
In 1866.....	612,228

So this schedule C, which ever since Pitt's time—except the years when there was no income tax—has been the schedule for the taxation of the public debt, yielded in a time of need in the Crimean war nearly nine million dollars in gold! It was called upon again last year for the Abyssinian war, but how much it yielded I do not know.

If Great Britain taxes thus when she pays but three per cent. interest, how happens it to be repudiation if we take twelve or thirteen million dollars off a large amount of interest in the aggregate when our creditor is receiving six per cent.? And what becomes of the statement of the Ways and Means Committee that no civilized country taxes as we proposed to tax and the implied statement that our present tax is larger than the English?

And I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that during the Crimean war the English deducted sixteen pence every time they paid out twenty shillings of interest on the public debt. In other words, instead of paying three per cent. interest on their consols they paid but two and three quarters per cent. Instead of paying five per cent. on terminable annuities they paid four and two thirds per cent. And still the Committee of Ways and Means say the proposition as it passed the House was merely to scale down the interest, and was such a proposition as no civilized nation ever tolerated! I say it was precisely similar to the English method, and that the only difference was that the English in the Crimean war taxed about seven per cent., and in Pitt's time ten per cent., and I appeal to the record for proof.

AMOUNT OF TAX.

One word as to amount of tax. The mode of collection is of more importance than the amount of tax. We have assessed as high as ten per cent., but leaving it to the individual conscience, got small returns. Pitt's tax was ten per cent., and collected at the counter of the bank.

If we measure the amount of this tax by that assessed on railroads ten per cent. would not seem too high. The railroad interest is a large one. The amount invested in the forty thousand miles of roads in the country is full two thirds of the vast total of the national debt. We tax dividends on railroads and bonds five per cent. and collect at the railroad office. We also assess them two and a half per cent. on the gross passenger receipts. The aggregate of the two is very much more than the proposed tax on the debt. And the answer that railroad proprietors can charge it off on the traveling public is not a full reply, because in many instances an increase of railroad tariff calls out rival modes of transportation or checks travel. It is to be considered, too, that railroad proprietors are taxed whether "residents or non-residents, foreigners or citizens." And farther, it should be recollected that in case of railroads there are no deduction on account of the income not amounting to $1,000. Every holder of a bond, no matter how poor, is assessed when he gets his interest. These facts show that in one law there is a discrimination in favor of the holder of our securities that is not to be found in the English law.

I would have no unfriendly discrimination against the holders of the debt whether citizens or foreigners. The debt is sacred. It must be paid according to the letter and spirit of the law creating it. But let us have this matter wisely arranged. The law is wrong as it stands. It is not in accordance with English precedent, and I cite that because that Government surely cannot be charged with discriminating against property in its taxation, and because they have managed a large debt wisely and successfully. If ten per cent. is too much as compared with other taxation, make the sum less, and if certain exemptions are proper to be made let them be made. I have said elsewhere that I am not in favor of a rebate of interest, as some have proposed. I am in favor of nothing that savors of repudiation, but I am in favor of such proper and fit taxation as will charge upon this great and lucrative property its share of the public burdens.

The difference between taxation for revenue and taxation for unfriendly purposes was seen between the ten per cent. tax levied on State bank bills for the avowed purpose of driving them out of existence and the tax now levied on national banks for the purpose of revenue; so in this case I would assess just the sum and no more than the property, as compared with other property, should fairly bear. There is no contract either here or in England to hinder this species of taxation, and certainly the "interests of labor," as well as all property interests, require that taxation should be equalized as rapidly as it can be fairly done.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. C. DELANO, OF OHIO,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 14, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. DELANO said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I presented to the House a few days since certain resolutions embracing my views in regard to the proper construction of the Constitution so far as it confers the power to make treaties. These resolutions had been previously laid before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I have reason to know they commanded the assent of several members of the committee. It is my sincere opinion they were approved by a majority. The session was nearly closed when they were presented for the first time to the committee, and not having time then to obtain official action on these resolutions, they were afterwards presented by me to the House, and were referred by the House back to the committee, in the expectation on my part that the honorable chairman would call the committee together again before the subject should be finally disposed of. It has not, for some reason, suited the pleasure of the honorable chairman to do so, and hence I cannot say that these resolutions are approved or disapproved by the committee.

It was my purpose, sir, to present the substance of those resolutions in the form of a preamble, to this bill had they been approved by the Committee on Foreign Relations; but having failed, for the reasons before assigned, to obtain the sanction of the committee, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] having already offered a similar proposition, I shall now read these resolutions, as the conclusions to be sustained and supported by the remarks I am about to make. They are as follows:

"1. Resolved, That all treaties made by the President and Senate which embrace stipulations on legislative subjects expressly vested in Congress by the Constitution, are in their nature incomplete and imperfect until Congress shall have passed such laws as are necessary to carry such treaties into effect; and that this House is not required, by a just interpretation of the Constitution, to pass laws necessary to the execution of such treaties unless it approves the objects and stipulations therein embraced.

"2. That a treaty which stipulates for the payment of money undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do without the aid of legislation, and therefore such a treaty is not the supreme law of the land until the required legislation has been obtained; and members of this House, while deliberating upon propositions for executing such treaty, act on their own judgment and responsibility, and not on the judgment and responsibility of the treaty-making power.

"3. That foreign Governments are presumed to know that the power to appropriate money is vested in Congress, and that no act of any one part of the Government can be regarded as a law until such act has the sanction of all Departments of the Government required by the Constitution to give it the force of law.

"4. That the integrity and limits of the territory of this nation cannot be altered or changed except by the will of the nation, given by express grant or implied by acquiescence; and therefore the treaty-making power has no authority under the Constitution to dispose of the nation's territory nor to acquire new territory without obtaining the assent of the nation therefor in one or the other of the forms herein indicated."

The treaty-making power, sir, has on several occasions since the formation of the Government been subjected to animated and exhaustive discussions. These discussions have been conducted by the ablest and purest statesmen of which the nation can boast. It is not, therefore, to be expected that new light can be thrown at this day upon that portion of our Constitution which provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur," or that other clause declaring that

"all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land."

It would be well, however, for this discussion to call public attention to the construction which has heretofore been given to the Constitution on the subject of the treaty-making power by the great statesmen who have preceded us, and whose clear perceptions have been so distinctly expressed as to place this subject beyond fair and reasonable controversy.

Mr. Chairman, we are a forgetful people, especially when our ambition, our interests, or our cupidity makes it necessary to forget. I desire, therefore, to remind this House and the nation what those who have preceded us have decided in regard to this power of making treaties. I am the more anxious to do this now because I think I observe a growing disposition to enlarge and exalt the treaty-making power, to confer upon it a sort of omnipotence, that shall make it override and destroy other and coördinate branches of the Government; and I think I see in this disposition danger, great danger, for the future of this country.

If this power is not checked in its claims and assumptions it will swallow up and destroy the legislative authority, and it may, if it goes on to execute its exorbitant claims, totally change our form of government, and overthrow our republican institution.

Like the great, ever increasing, and never satisfied power of patronage, it needs to be checked, it must be checked, or our institutions are in danger.

Now, sir, we are invited to appropriate $7,200,000 for the purchase of Alaska. A treaty for this purchase has been concluded, so far as the President and Senate have power to conclude it; and this House is now invited to make an appropriation to pay the amount which the treaty-making power has agreed to pay for this territory.

I said this House is "invited" to make this appropriation, but if the doctrine advanced by some persons on this floor is correct this House is ordered to make this appropriation. And this brings me to state what is the first great and important question growing out of this subject. It is this: Has this House any discretion, any deliberative will, any free judgment in this business, or is it bound blindly and like a well constructed piece of machinery to appropriate the money which the treaty-making power has agreed shall be paid?

I will concede for the sake of the argument that there is no fraud in the treaty. That it does not directly change nor tend to change our free institutions; in short, that we cannot say that it is in any manner so tainted by fraud, or so clearly without constitutional warrant as to be void ab initio; and then under this admission I inquire whether this House, when called upon to appropriate the money, may judge of the propriety and wisdom of the purchase, and if satisfied that it was a purchase unfit to be made refuse the money required to complete the purchase? Sir, if the House has not this right, it is not in this matter a deliberative body; it is only a wax figure, an ornament, or an appendage to the treaty-making power.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution which defines the power to make treaties and vests this power in the President and Senate grants also certain powers to other departments of the Government, and in doing so provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Now, sir, is it not an indisputable proposition that each grant of power to different departments of this Government must be construed in reference to other grants in the same instrument, so that each must be subordinated to the other? Without such a rule there can be and will be no harmony in your Government, unless it is the harmony which is procured by allowing one department to override, swallow up, and destroy the other.

But I am told that a treaty is the supreme law of the land. The Constitution does not so read; but it does say, "that all treaties made" "under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land."

I now inquire of this House, and especially of its members belonging to the legal profession, under what circumstances are we authorized to say that a treaty is made "under the authority of the United States?" Think of this for a moment, and think carefully. If the treaty requires no money, and does not interfere with certain powers expressly conferred upon the Legislature, such as the power to regulate commerce, to establish a uniform rule for naturalization, or the like, then it may be said that the treaty executes itself; and if it is not tainted with fraud, and does not alter the form of our institutions, it may be said of it, under such circumstances, that it has been made "under the authority of the United States." But, sir, the case before us is very different. Here is a treaty which stipulates that $7,200,000 shall be paid for the territory to be acquired. This money cannot be paid until it is appropriated, and this House has a voice, a will, and a judgment in this business; the treaty does not execute itself, it requires the sanction of the Legislature, and it is not made, cannot be completed "under the authority of the United States" until Congress has appropriated the money. Therefore I conclude that such a treaty is inchoate or incomplete until it has been approved by this House, and the money appropriated for its execution. Until this is done the treaty is not the "supreme law of the land."

Now, to say that in this act of legislation under the Constitution this House has no discretion but is bound, in blind obedience to the treaty-making power, to appropriate the money, is to deprive the House of all free, deliberative will and judgment, and to make the treaty power a despotic power, which may control, direct, and coerce this House into a grant of money, provided always the treaty is without fraud, and does not change the form of our Government or in some other manner violate the Constitution.

Sir, this monstrous doctrine alarms me; and I feel it to be a duty to denounce it and to deny its tyrannical assumptions. I am aware, sir, that this doctrine has been heretofore asserted. It was claimed during the discussions growing out of the so-called Jay treaty in 1796, but was refuted then and condemned by the great statesmen of that day, and it was overruled then by the solemn judgment of the House of Representatives. After a most exhaustive examination of the subject the House passed a resolution which concluded in these words:

"And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Sir, here is asserted the right and power which I claim for this House now, the right to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying into effect this treaty, the right to determine what in their judgment will be most conducive to the public good. Is it best for the welfare of this Government to conclude this treaty? Will it promote the happiness and prosperity of this nation? Will it tend to perpetuate, or will it tend to overthrow our institutions? These are the great and grave questions for each member of this House to decide for himself before he votes away $7,200,000 of the people's money under the existing condition of the public debt and of our national finances.

Sir, for myself, I will never vote this appropriation until my judgment enables me to say that I believe this treaty is for the public good, and were I to say that now and here, with my present information, I should say what I do not believe to be true.

The reasons given for the passage of the resolution of 1796, by the statesmen who voted for and advocated it, are conclusive and unanswerable. I do not propose to examine these reasons at length, nor to refer in detail to the exhaustive debate which preceded the adoption of the resolution; but I cannot omit one or two extracts from the remarks of Mr. Gallatin, whose clear and comprehensive views on this as on all other subjects are so remarkable as to be worthy of repetition. While advocating the right of the House to call on the President for information in regard to the treaty he said:

"He would therefore state his opinion that the House had the right to ask for the papers called for, because their cooperation and sanction were necessary to carry the treaty into full effect to render it a binding instrument, and to make it, properly speaking, a law of the land; because they had a full discretion either to give or refuse that cooperation; because they must be guided in the exercise of that discretion by the merits and expediency of the treaty itself, and therefore had a right to ask for every information which could assist them in deciding the question."

Mr. Gallatin then refers to British precedents, and shows that the Parliament has a controlling power over treaties, and that this controlling power was exercised in 1739, in the case of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain, and in the treaty of commerce between France and Great Britain. He then adds:

"It remains to be examined whether we are in a worse situation than Great Britain; whether the House of Representatives of the United States, the substantial and immediate Representatives of the American people shall be ranked below the British House of Commons; whether the legislative power shall be swallowed up by the treaty-making authority, as contended for here, though never claimed in Great Britain."

And Mr. Gallatin then concludes:

"If this doctrine is sanctioned, if it is allowed that treaties may regulate appropriations and repeal existing laws, and the House by rejecting the present resolution, declare that they give up all control, all right to the exercise of discretion, it is tantamount to saying that they abandon their share in legislation, and that they consent that the whole power should be concentrated in other branches. He did not believe such a doctrine could be countenanced by the House. If gentlemen should insist upon maintaining this doctrine, should deny the free agency of the House, and their right to judge of the expediency of carrying the treaty into effect, the friends of the independence of the House will be driven to the necessity to reject this treaty whether good or bad, to assert the contested right. If the gentlemen abandon this ground, then the policy of the measure could be weighed on fair ground, and the treaty carried into effect, if reconcilable to the interest of the United States."

During the debate in 1796 Mr. Gallatin was supported by Mr. Livingston, Mr. Madison, Mr. Murray, Mr. Baldwin, and others, and finally by the vote of the House itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will leave this branch of the argument by simply referring to the additional authorities in support of it, which have been fully collated and are presented in the minority report in this case, prepared with great diligence, care, and ability by the honorable member from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN.] Here then, sir, I take my stand on the same solid, constitutional ground upon which Mr. Gallatin placed himself in 1796. I will consider the expediency of your treaty, and weigh fairly the policy of the measure. When you concede in a tangible and efficient form the right of this House to a free judgment and a deliberative will, while considering and passing upon the proposed appropriation. If you do not concede this right, then I have to say I will assuredly refuse to vote for the appropriation. I will, if I stand alone, maintain the constitutional rights and the independence of this House.

I may be asked in what way shall it be conceded that the House has a right to judge of the policy and utility of the treaty? I answer by a preamble to be attached to the bill; a preamble that shall become part of the measure of appropriation; a preamble to which the Senate may agree when it assents to the appropriation; a preamble which shall admonish and notify the treaty-making power and foreign nations that treaties which require legislation before they are executed are incomplete and inchoate until such legislation is granted; and that this House when called upon for such legislation is not a blind tool and instrument of the treaty-making power, but is a deliberative body, having a discretion to give or withhold the required appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the House having adopted the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] has substantially affirmed its right to judge and deliberate for itself when called upon to appropriate money for the execution of treaties; and having thus asserted itself, I admit that a very great objection to the bill as originally introduced has, in my opinion, been removed.

Having claimed this right it becomes our duty to exercise it, and thus we are brought to the consideration of the following question: Is it better for the welfare of this nation now, and hereafter, considering all the circumstances, that this treaty with Russia which the Executive has commenced shall be completed and executed? This question involves a wide range of thought, and leads to many reflections which time, or rather the want of time, must exclude on this occasion.

I recognize the desire, nay, the passion of the American people for the acquisition of territory. Being so universal and so powerful, it is dangerous to oppose it, and hence politicians and ambitious men not only yield to it, but inflame it, because it gives them a day or an hour of favor with the people. Wisdom, and judgment see in this constant expansion of territory that we are laying the foundation for discord if not for disruption. We are bringing under one government diversified and conflicting interests—unhomogeneous and dissimilar peoples—and above all, we are at too early a day, I fear, subjecting our institutions to the test as to their capacity and adaptation for the control of such conflicting elements.

There are in this Government, I think, two great forces which threaten to bring evil in their train—one is the force resulting from the desire for acquisition, the other is the force of patronage. These act and react upon each other. The acquisition of territory increases the power of patronage, and the power and influence of patronage aids and accelerates acquisition and expansion. Sincerely believing that these forces seriously threaten our future destiny, and that it is wiser to hold them in check than to stimulate them into increased vigor, I cannot do justice to my own convictions unless I seek to restrain the passion for acquisition. Let us develop what we now own. Our possessions are vast and our resources inexhaustible. Money, mind, muscle, and time are necessary to realize the greatness of our present empire. While engaged in this work we may be able to limit the power of patronage, so that it shall not boast of its ability to control every branch and department of the Government. Let us exhibit to the world the utility of our institutions by the justice and parity of their working; and then, when time shall have made us strong and exhibited the necessity of expansion, our descendants, if need be, may enlarge our boundaries. I would rather see this than to see posterity engaged in the work of dividing and separating into distinct and different governments, an overgrown, unwieldy, and discordant empire, hastened too early to the zenith of its glory by the unwise philosophy of yielding to the cupidity, ambition, or passion of the hour.

We are reminded, however, that we must execute this treaty or justify Russia in making war upon us, and the history of our relations with France, growing out of the treaty of July 4, 1831, is referred to as authority for this assertion. There is no analogy between the cases, and I cannot see why the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has ventured to assume the existence of such analogy. In the case before us the treaty is incomplete and the purchase not made until the money required has been appropriated. No liability exists while a contract is in process of making. Russia is presumed to understand our laws and Constitution, and therefore knew that the execution of this treaty depended upon the judgment and will of the national Legislature. She cannot therefore complain, for she has no cause of complaint, if the Legislature refuse the appropriation.

Here, then, is the case before us: Russia has surrendered possession before the treaty was completed; she had no right to do so; she was in too great haste in this; but the fault is hers, not ours. It would have been more respectful to the legislative authority of the nation if the Executive had not with such indecent haste attempted to embarrass the nation by taking possession of the ceded territory before Congress had any opportunity to act; and the Executive deserves to be informed that he cannot by such usurpations commit and bind the Government to injudicious and unwise negotiations.

Executive usurpations of late are so common and so flagrant, and the power of executive patronage so powerful, that we are in danger of forgetting that there is any branch or arm in the nation except the Executive. And while these usurpations, which lead to despotism, are being multiplied the cry is constantly made that Congress is the usurping power. This is simply the tyrant's plea and the tyrant's trick as if the people's Representatives who are elected only for two years, and are without the power of patronage, are likely to become usurpers. The absurdity of this charge is its best refutation. Let it never be forgotten, however, that if tyranny and despotism shall ever usurp the powers of this Government and overthrow our Constitution and laws, it will be done by the Executive, under the influence and power of the overshadowing and ever-increasing patronage of the President. Thus it may be seen that Russia will have no right to complain if the $7,200,000 are not appropriated.

But how different were the circumstances in the case of our treaty with France. France had long been indebted to our citizens for unlawful spoiliations upon our commerce. The claims of these citizens were admitted, they were clear and incontestible. At length they were recognized by the treaty of 1831. This treaty did not create these claims, it simply recognized them and guaranteed their payment. There was no reason why these claims had not been paid long prior to 1831, and war to enforce their settlement and payment would have been justifiable prior to the signing of the treaty of 1831. To withhold the money longer after the treaty had been made was adding insult to injury, and therefore General Jackson but uttered the just sense of the nation and of mankind when he threatened France with war to enforce her duty to American citizens, so long and so unreasonably neglected and refused. What fair-minded statesman can discover any resemblance between this case and our incomplete, unexecuted treaty for the purchase of Russian America I leave the able chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations to explain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will refer briefly to some reasons why the treaty should not be executed. First, then, it annexes territory not coterminous, but distant some four hundred miles from our present possessions, thus inaugurating a practice totally different from that hitherto prevailing, and furnishing an example for the annexation of any territory, island, or people, on the face of the globe. I declare, sir, that in my judgment this treaty, if consummated, will be a most dangerous precedent. We shall never be satisfied while owning this territory until we also acquire the British possessions which separate us; and the desire of our people now so strong for the occupation of British North America—a desire, sir, that cannot be ignored—will be stimulated by this purchase of Alaska and intensified among our people to an extent that will not promote, if it does not disturb, the peace of nations.

But I may be told that we "want" the British possessions on our north. Certainly we do, and we want all other lands that adjoin us, and some that do not. What we desire is one thing; what we need is another. And how to proceed in obtaining that which we need or that which we desire is quite another question. To me, sir, it seems an alarming fact, boding no good for the future, that we are furnishing an example for the annexation of territory not contiguous, by which we may be led on to buy remote islands and to annex distant nations with populations that we cannot control by our own institutions, and to govern whom will only be preparing ourselves for the overthrow of a republican and the introduction of a despotic government.

All this, sir, may be called idle fear, and be scouted by gigantic intellects and comprehensive statesmen; but time, which is a great historian, if not a present prophet, will decide whether this passion, now to be converted into a governmental policy, for endless and unlimited expansion and acquisition, South, North, everywhere, is wise or unwise. I think it is better that we propagate our institutions by exhibiting to the world their utility, their beneficence, their adaptation to the happiness of our people, rather than by attempting to embrace this entire planet at once under the cover of our "eagle's wings." The extravagant and exaggerated eulogies upon the soil, climate, minerals, fisheries, &c., of this Russian territory, fail to convince me that this purchase is valuable. There are few of our people, sir, who will seek a residence under the tropic of the north star, unless they have a stronger love for inclement weather, unproductive soil, and savage neighbors, than the inhabitants of Russia. It is a remarkable fact that during the long ownership of this country by Russia, but few of her people have made it their home, their permanent residence; and when it is remembered that emigration is apt to follow the line of latitude on which it starts, it is to my mind a convincing argument that this country is unfit to be, and never will be, the abode and residence of civilization to any great extent. It is idle and absurd to presume otherwise.

A refutation of the extravagant accounts of Russian America, made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the House, could be easily presented if time permitted by introducing extracts from his report. For example, on page 24 of this document, which for the benefit of mankind is to be preserved in history, we read:

"Alaska is a region of contrasts in character, product, and climate. It is three countries rather than one, and that which is true of one part may have no relation whatever to either of the others. It has an interior, a Pacific, and an Arctic region wholly distinct from each other." "To assume that a fact applicable to a part of these greatly diversified regions, and especially a fact that describes Sitka, which belongs rather to British Columbia than Russian America, as a characteristic of the several Alaskan regions, would be wholly unjust. We know very little of these particular countries, and nothing at all of countries like them."

Here are some important admissions, to which I invite attention. This country is really "three countries," we are informed, totally different in "character, product, and climate," of which "very little is known;" and of countries like them, it is said, we know absolutely nothing. There is, in my judgment, quite as much candor in this extract as in any part of the report.

In the face of this admission, however, there is an attempt to describe with accuracy the soil, climate, minerals, fisheries, and other characteristics and products of this territory, about which it has just been admitted we "know so little." It is also a remarkable fact that while describing and painting this territory, in order to induce us to purchase it, we are not very often informed to which of its "three divisions" the excellencies spoken of belong; whether it is the "interior," the "Pacific," or the "Arctic" division that is entitled to the particular eulogy is more than can be always ascertained by an examination of the report. However, if the aggregate of excellence described in the honorable chairman's report in climate, soil, and product be equally divided among the three sections of this country, we may, by assuming that the report is all fact and not fiction, presume that every inch of this territory is much to be coveted.

It is to be observed, however, by a very careless reading of this report (see page 26) that along the "sea-board" there is an "enormous amount of rainfall;" that the weather there is "essentially cloudy throughout the year;" and it is candidly admitted that "this has its normal effect upon the class of vegetation that will succeed in ripening under such conditions of climate."

It is also admitted on the same page "that the whole extent of country subject to these rains is covered with sphagnum (moss) from one to two feet in depth, and even on the hill-sides this carpet is saturated with water and renders progress through it very slow and difficult."

Elsewhere it is said this "moss" is used for fuel. Here, then, is one "division" of your triple country. This I suppose may be called the "Pacific" division. Having previously been informed by this report (see page 20) that the warm currents from the equator, which wash the shores of western America, cause such a modification of temperature as to create a mild climate in very high latitudes, I was prepared to suppose that the "Pacific" division would certainly be the most desirable part of Alaska. And I still think, if any of my friends remove to Alaska, I shall advise them to settle in this region rather than venture into the "interior," among the Esquimaux, or go to the unexplored "Arctic" divisions.

Referring again to the accounts in regard to the "Pacific" division, I find it said on page 22 that in latitude 55° "ground ice" is found at any time of the year six or eight feet below the surface. We are happily informed, however, that this "ground ice" does not prevent "berries" or "vegetables" from growing; but the kind of "berries" or "vegetables" that flourish in latitude 55° north, where an eternal bed of ice is to be found six feet beneath the surface, and where the surface itself is not thawed out more than three or four months in a year, I leave the able and candid author of the report to which I have referred to explain.

On page 22 of this report we are, however, informed that among the Esquimaux, where the moss or sphagnum which covers the whole country has been removed, as at Fort St. Nicholas, the ground actually thaws to an average depth of three feet from the surface.

This is refreshing, indeed, to the agriculturist, and will make him exclaim with rapturous delight this is the place where—

"Oats, peas, beans, and barley grow."

Only imagine, as soon as you get rid of this fungus, called moss, which covers the entire country, the surface will actually thaw out to the depth of three feet sometimes, and then you have nothing but a measureless depth of "ground ice" beneath, which keeps you cool and comfortable while cultivating corn or harvesting small grain, and relieves you from all unpleasant danger of sun-stroke.

HO. OF REPS.

But the striking adaptation of this country for agriculture is established by some facts presented on the twenty-fourth page of this report, where we are informed that during the year there are one hundred and seventy-four days in which "snow and rain fall at intervals," one hundred and seventeen days when snow and rain fall continuously, and of pleasant days absolutely seventy-four, which make, all told, two months and a half of pleasant weather.

If this is not sufficient to induce our prairie and eastern farmers to abandon this abominable climate and flee to a country where they can stand on perpetual ice and be refreshed with showers of snow and rain two hundred and ninety-one days in each year, we shall be compelled to doubt their intelligence, and must say to them, "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone."

Mr. Chairman, this purchase can do us no good; will do us much harm. It is without value either to agriculture, commerce, or manufacturing industry. It will be simply a source of expense, and will add to the taxation of an already over-taxed people. It increases executive patronage, and makes room for a score or more of Government employes who render no valuable service for their salaries. When first presented to the American people it was universally condemned, and would be now if the honest voice of the nation could be heard.

But, sir, by some means this voice has been suppressed. At first the entire press of the country condemned the treaty, but by some strange and unaccountable means, and for some reason not apparent to the majority of mankind, this voice of the press has been stifled. Nothing now can be published unless it favors the completion of this treaty, and everything admitted into the daily reports of the Associated Press must be in favor of its ratification. Time may disclose the reasons that have produced this wonderful change. Time may furnish information as to the inducements for so many voluntary essays in the daily journals in behalf of this treaty. The people may discover hereafter how public sentiment is manufactured when a great scheme, costing great sums cannot be consummated by great men without manufacturing a public sentiment in its favor.

Mr. Chairman, I condemn this treaty, and I regret that it was made. If the appropriation for its execution passes without the preamble which has been offered I shall esteem it a great calamity. With such a preamble I shall feel that some of the objections to the appropriation have been removed. I want the treaty-making power to understand that it is not omnipotent, and that it cannot buy and sell territory nor coerce appropriations without the consent of the popular branch of the Government.

In what I have said, sir, I do not wish to be understood as reflecting upon the conduct of the Secretary of State in negotiating this purchase. I do not sympathize with those who distrust his patriotism or depreciate his statesmanship. I believe, sir, that the nation owes this man a debt of gratitude it never will nor never can repay; and however much I may differ from him in regard to the propriety or utility of this purchase, I shall never forget his great services rendered to his country. Called to the office of Foreign Affairs at the inception of the great rebellion, he brought to the discharge of his difficult and delicate duties the high and rare excellencies of character which that position required. Wisdom, calmness, and discretion characterized his conduct in conducting our relations with foreign nations during the most critical period of the nation's history; and but for the possession and exercise of those high qualifications it is difficult to say what complications might not have arisen to embarrass the nation in the important work of self-preservation. For these inestimable services I shall always honor him, however I may disapprove other parts of his history.

SPEECH OF HON. HORACE MAYNARD, OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 16, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MAYNARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Once more, after an interval of eight years, the people of the South are called upon to take part in a presidential election. The part they shall take is a question of deepest moment to them and to their children. Shall they espouse the "lost cause" or the "living cause," is the practical issue. It is as clear as in 1864, when each had its flag in the field. There is no middle alternative; there can be none. All attempts to organize by ignoring the great struggle of the last eight years as presenting nothing but "dead issues" and "by-gones" have failed, and will constantly fail. All the men who aspire to rise, in forgetfulness of the lessons taught us in these years of carnage and devastation are doomed to perpetual defeat. They would climb by a rotten ladder.

THE LOST CAUSE.

What, then, is the "lost cause?" I shall indulge neither in epithet nor denunciation; but leave them to its devotees and mourners. There has from an early period been found in the South an element of opposition to popular government—a wide-spread distrust of man's self-governing capacity, accompanied with a kindred feeling that the ability to rule was limited to a small and favored class, comprising the wealth and culture and the social preëminence ascribed to the traditional "first families." These sentiments prevailed in South Carolina and Virginia; to some extent in North Carolina, less in Georgia. During the revolutionary war they developed strongly in the haughty and defiant Tory party, that looked contemptuously on the efforts to maintain the self-evident truths. After the war they struggled to perplex and dash the counsels of the men who, having secured for their country independence and a recognized place in the family of nations, were laboring to give it a stable government, as the best guarantee of their dearly-bought liberties. They resisted the formation and the adoption of the Constitution. When adopted they labored to emasculate it by such construction as would deprive it of its vital energy and reduce it to a limited partnership from which any member might retire at pleasure. By what arts they sought and gained ascendancy is of less importance to be known than the use made of it when gained.

That the country grew and flourished, not by reason of them, but in spite of them, is demonstrated by the growth of the last eight years, greater than that of any quarter of a century previous. Always loud in defense of the rights of the people and the rights of the States, they used this cry to cripple and embarrass the General or Federal Government, which was, in truth, the surest safeguard of both. They affected a superservicable reverence for the Constitution which they invariably interpreted in that sense least favorable to the dignity and efficiency of the national authority. Everything was opposed which appeared likely to attach the people more strongly to the Government by interest or pride; all measures fostering our commerce and commercial marine; for opening and improving highways and the great channels of internal trade; for providing a currency redolent of nationality; for encouraging American industry in its diversified pursuits, or for promoting amity and good-will among the other nations. Such ideas could not remain speculative and impersonal. They found many and zealous propagandists. A great, powerful, and successful political party was unconsciously manipulated in their interest.

NULLIFICATION.

One of the prodigious growths of South Carolina was John C. Calhoun. Gifted, educated in the best northern schools, he while young entered public life, and soon became conspicuous, no less for his talents and industry than for the breadth of his patriotism. He was a great man; he was then a thoroughly national man. In 1824, and again in 1828, he was elected to the second office in the gift of the people. He aspired to the first; and the aspiration became a possession which overmastered him, as it has done many others of greater or less note from that day down quite to the present. During his second term of service as Vice President and General Jackson's first term as President he encountered the devious methods of New York politics to his cost; as has happened in recent times. Calhoun went down; Martin Van Buren supplanted him in popular favor and in Jackson's support. Disappointed, defeated, outwitted, obagrined, maddened, he turned his great powers against the Government of which he no longer hoped to be the President. His first and immediate effort was to array his own little State in an attitude of hostility. But the determined bearing of Old Hickory, himself a southern man, and the utter want of sympathy with the movement outside of South Carolina, satisfied him that it was premature. So nullification, in the first act a tragedy, in the second ended as a farce; and its author was saved from disgrace, if not from something worse, by the interposition and compromise of Mr. Clay.

The pretext for this movement was commercial, a tariff act. General Jackson, who comprehended the situation, and knew that disunion was meant, knew also that the scheme was adjourned, not abandoned. "The next time," said he, in a letter to Mr. Forsyth, "the pretext will be slavery."

SOUTHERN DEMOCRACY.

Not long after the inauguration of Mr. Van Buren the country was surprised one day by Mr. Calhoun's visiting the White House and tendering to the President his friendship and support. The offer was embraced, and the Democratic party takes date from that period; the two elements, Van Burenism and Calhounism, working together, the one for ascendancy and place, the other for revenge, until they finally dissolved at the convention which assembled at Charleston on the 23d of April, 1860. They are now trying to recombine; with what success remains to be seen.

The platform of this party consisted of the Virginia and Kentucky State-rights resolutions of 1798-99, and a set of resolutions upon slavery prepared under the direction of Mr. Calhoun and offered in this House on the 11th December, 1838, by Mr. Charles G. Atherton, of New Hampshire. These were the staple; everything else was occasional and casual. The southern Democracy, as the Calhounists were called, controlled the organization. And never was rule more despotic. Complete subservience, unconditional surrender, were the only terms ever made with their northern associates. So long as they were obedient and not too aspiring they were held in favor. But let one of them become restive or seek a directing control, the curt mandate was, off with his head! so much for him! These were the men who foreordained nominations and adjusted anew the platform. One of their schemes was to prescribe what were called tests of Democracy; always some new measure, more and more obnoxious to northern sentiment, on the subject of slavery. By this operation men of principle and self-respect were continually driven from the party throughout the North until it was reduced to a minority in nearly every northern State. As the correlative of this process, and by the going to pieces of the Whig party, (broken up by the craft of the same men,) they obtained the ascendancy in nearly all the southern States.

The real object which the southern leaders kept steadily in view was disunion. They taught it in public and in private, by the press, in the pulpit, on the stump, at the schools, and where ever chance threw a promising disciple in their way. A generation of young men grew up and migrated to every part of the southern country as editors, politicians, and professional men, who had been taught the right of secession and the kindred heresies of the Calhoun philosophy. They familiarized the people with the idea of disunion and a southern confederacy. Southern grievances were continually paraded; northern men were constantly reviled and disparaged; hatred toward the whole section was artfully excited; jealousy of its prosperity, contempt for the alleged traits of its people; their own superior prowess dexterously extolled, and the charms duly set forth of a government that should have no North, in which there should come no Yankees, and where every man should either be a "nigger" or own a "nigger." Southern commercial conventions were annually held at which were industriously discussed the reopening of the African slave trade and the dissolution of the American Union. Books and periodicals, filled with the most atrocious utterances, were thrown upon the community. In this way public sentiment was operated upon, and the public mind was confused.

The other side was rarely heard. Few men thought their proslavery worth an answer; fewer still who cared to refute them and encounter the storm of invective and ribaldry, possibly insult and violence, which an answer would have been sure to arouse. For in practice, neither freedom of speech nor of the press was tolerated by these fierce spirits—fire-eaters they called themselves—except on their own side. A class of northern writers sometimes handled the topics with great vigor; but generally in such a style as unconsciously to lend plausibility to these pernicious heresies. Another class of northern partisan writers delighted to charge upon their opponents the most astounding designs against the whole population of the South. The words of the former class were carefully reproduced as expressing the opinions and the feelings of the northern people, while those of the latter were cited as evidence to establish the correctness of the inference. The Fourth of July, the Declaration of Independence, the flag and the eagle, and the national airs, the traditions and emblems of our happiest memory, were sedulously discarded. Everything was repressed which was calculated to stimulate patriotism or to awaken a love of country.

Under such influences and by such preparation was slowly and by degrees developed the "lost cause." The teaching of Yancey was "to fire the southern heart" in readiness for the first occasion. The election of Mr. Fremont in 1856, had it occurred, would have been such an occasion. It did not, and they prearranged for an election in 1860 which should furnish it. How paltered these juggling fiends at Charleston and then at Baltimore; how they passed the summer and autumn in denouncing every man in advance who should deign to hold office under a "Black Republican" President, or consent to live under his administration; how, when they saw the people inclined to submit to the laws and to wait for something more outrageous than a political defeat before they joined in rebellion against the Government, they threatened violent resistance, and, failing to provoke coercive authority, inaugurated their "cause" by bombarding an unfinished fort, containing a garrison of less than one hundred starving men; all this we knew very well at the time, though the immense volumes of subsequent experience have impaired the recollection of these earlier chapters.

THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.

The "lost cause" was an idea, a sentiment, a principle of hostility to the Republican theory of self-government, taking organic shape in the "southern confederacy," which its second officer declared to be based upon slavery, and which one of its leading organs, the Richmond Examiner, boldly announced to be "a distinct reaction against the civilization of the age." Never walked a fouler spirit upon this planet. Cruel, intolerant, overbearing, implacable, unforgiving, treacherous, perfidious, ungenerous, ungrateful, avaricious, penurious, tyrannical to the weak, insolent to equals and sycophantic to the strong, it combined the vicious defects of opposite systems without the redeeming traits of either; a strange coöperation of free and of arbitrary government to form a type of depravity that neither unaided could produce. It was the ideal of evil, villainy sublimed. Beginning in robbery and ending in repudiation, there was no crime in the catalogue of guilt that it did not commit. Reversing the Roman maxim it spared the strong and warred upon the weak. Old men and children and women, men defenseless and alone, were its victims. Prisoners were scourged and pillaged and then put to death under the prolongation of torture. The pathetic sanctity of the grave was denied, and trinkets were whittled from the bones of the slain.

Boasting of chivalry and a loftier honor than belonged to the rest of the country, it demonstrated beyond cavil that its honor was a sham and that its chivalry lacked every virtue and every grace belonging to the semi-civilized institution it affected to imitate. Its prison-pens at Montgomery, Andersonville, Salisbury, Libby, Castle Thunder, and Belle Isle have become historic to the relief of the Jersey prison-ship and the Black Hole of Calcutta. It idolized military heroes, who displayed the acquirements of the bandit, the foot-pad, and the blackleg, and neglected those of real merit. Its chosen civil rulers, both dishonest and incapable, understood neither the obstacles to be overcome nor the means at their command. Never did men, engaged in the great work they pretended to, exhibit such poverty of thought. Not a state paper exists worth being read. Not a lofty sentiment, not a generous appeal, not a noble or magnanimous defiance was ever uttered. There was neither grandeur in victory nor pathos in defeat. Eloquence attempted no successful flights; poetry felt no inspiration; music had none but borrowed melodies; art furnished neither statues nor pictures, and literature not a line to be remembered. Such was the "lost cause" in its heyday as it appeared to all but the deluded women and youth, who decked its hideousness in the hues of their own gaudy imaginations. Of such are not the kingdoms of earth. Nations are not constructed of so base material. Well is it called the "lost" cause, just as we speak of a "lost" woman, a "lost" spirit, a "lost" soul.

So understood, it is no paradox that it still abides, direful, portentous, a power for evil in the land. Hardly had it recovered from the first craven fear of hanging and confiscation which followed the defeat of its arms before it renewed the same vile practices which marked its progress from the outset. Clothed by the mistaken clemency of the Executive with local authority, it forebore hostility toward the Government and the northern people indeed, but exhausted its virulence upon objects at home, the emancipated and enfranchised colored people, the white unionists, and persons of northern birth, especially settlers since the war, or, to borrow its own dialect, the "niggers," the "scalawags," and the "carpet-baggers."

TREATMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE.

The hostility to the colored people amounts to passion, almost to madness. Everything likely to alleviate their hard condition has been resisted bitterly as leading to "negro equality," their freedom, their right to control their own labor, to own property, to testify in court, no less than the right to vote and to hold office. Efforts for their education have provoked especial persecution. School-houses have been burned and schools broken up; schoolmasters, white and colored, have been subjected to cruel scourgings and other nameless indignities, and driven away; schoolmistresses have fared only not so bad; and these outrages, not single acts of wickedness, confined in their locality, but so numerous and so far asunder as to demonstrate preconcert and purpose. The riots at Memphis and New Orleans in 1866 are but too well known. Murdered, shot at, whipped, robbed, disarmed, to say nothing of insults and contumelies numberless, what have these people done to provoke, I do not say deserve, such treatment? According to no man's theory were they the responsible cause of the war which resulted in their freedom. Not by their own seeking are they free. To them every franchise has come like unsought blessings from above. Nor can it be truthfully said that they have misused their gifts. The arson, rape, and slaughter traditionally in reserve for the master race whenever the slave should be made free have not, I believe, in a single instance occurred. With all their discouragements they have been more nearly self-sustaining than the same number of landless and homeless people of the white race.

The few millions wisely and humanely expended by the Freedmen's Bureau for the care of the very old and the very young, and for securing to all some degree of justice and fair dealing, have been rendered necessary by neglect and oppression where we should have expected better things. It was something else that aroused the ire against them. Every individual colored man surrounded by his little household, in his "castle of defense," though but the humblest cabin, is to the "lost cause" a badge of defeat, and he is visited with the wrath impotent against the power of the Government. It is the ignoble vengeance of the ruffian who, worsted in his public broils, takes satisfaction at home in beating his wife and children. Such is the spectacle nightly exhibited somewhere in the South of a party of young white men, claiming to be gentlemen, boasting of chivalry, stealthily surrounding the lowly home of an inoffensive colored man, generally one whose years and character give him influence with his race, dragging him from his bed to lacerate him with hundreds of stripes, if not to take his life. Brave young men! the pride of the "lost cause," soldiers, perchance, in the non-combatant departments of the confederate armies, figuring appropriately at "tournaments," as they call the puerile imitations of the cast-off rubbish of an obsolete age.

TREATMENT OF WHITE UNIONISTS.

Not black men alone are the objects of their spite. The Union white men, loyal to their Government, who either never joined the "lost cause" or have abandoned it, southern by birth, education, and constant residence, the "scalawags" of their vocabulary, come in for a heavy share. None so worthy or so worthless as to escape. The best talents, the highest culture, the purest morals, alike with the lowest and most degraded, fall into condemnation if not in sympathy with this accursed spirit. The recent assassination of Ashburn was a representative crime. The men who slew him were the type of their class; and they struck him down, not for any personal grievance, but as the embodiment of ideas and principles which they hated. It was an act truly worthy of the "lost cause," one of its most characteristic developments. An old man, much beyond the meridian, honored by being the chosen of his people, in the capital of his native Georgia, denied admission to the house of public entertainment, forced to accept obscure lodgings, is aroused from sleep at midnight by a band of wretches, and slain at the side of his bed. His murderers assume to be the first in what they call society. They plan the deed for days and execute it with as little mercy as a gang of pirates. He was a Radical, had been a consistent Union man, and favored the reconstruction acts of Congress and the new constitution. This was the head and front of his offending. To conceal their guilt they charged it upon his friends, the colored people. To palliate it they maligned his character. To justify it to their own consciences they cried, "One enemy less!" Fools! the number of the martyrs never grows less!

THE CARPET-BAGGERS.

Another class especially obnoxious to the "lost cause" is the men of northern birth who have gone into the South since the war, the "carpet-baggers," as they are sneeringly called. The greater part of them were Federal soldiers of greater or less merit, generally enterprising, sometimes aspiring, but whatever their character or pursuits they are made to feel that they are not wanted. If not openly insulted and forced into quarrels, or, perhaps, deadly encounters, they are shunned or met with supercilious politeness; their wives and children, little girls and boys, are constantly mortified and hurt in their tenderest feelings. No place is found for the divine precepts of hospitality, to feed even an enemy if he hunger, and if he thirst to give him drink. (See Appendix.)

I have not thought it necessary to make an array of proofs. They to whom these words are primarily addressed, the thoughtful and candid people of the South, know only too well that I do not exaggerate or overstate. Now I appeal to these people whether they have not had enough of the "lost cause" and its immedicable evils. What have they to gain by adhering to it or keeping alive its memories and traditions? To what purpose is it that secret clans are allowed to organize and in hideous garb to prowl and maraud? Do they imagine that a great people, a magnanimous people, will permit the black man, made free by their behest, to be trampled under foot and their boon turned into a curse? Can they believe that the country will not stand by the men who in the time of sore trial stood by the country? Are they conscious of no danger in practically denying to the citizens of other States their constitutional right of citizenship in all the States? Is it not about time to have done with these pestilent follies, or will they still sow the wind, not content to have reaped the whirlwind? Why not accept accomplished facts however unwelcome? Is not the southern confederacy defunct, exploded, collapsed, gone like the baseless fabric of a vision, burst like a bubble, and leaving nothing in its place? Is not slavery dead, very dead, dead beyond the hand of resurrection? Will not wise men act upon these two facts and all they import?

Then why contend against the inevitable? Why look mournfully upon the past, and not hopefully upon the future? Why seek to rebuild the wrecked and shattered fortunes of a party that has entailed so much sorrow upon the land? Why repeat the folly popularly described as "crying after spilled milk?" Why persecute the negroes; why curse the Radicals? Why waste your time in "tournaments" and in the obsequies of the "lost cause?" Why make yourselves ridiculous by mouthing of "negro equality?" Do you not see that while you were looking backward and trying to reverse the civilization of the age the world leaped forward more than a "cycle of Cathay?" Then dismiss the "lost cause" into the limbo of lost and forgotten things, and join that other "cause" which represents humanity and progress and civilization, keeping up with its ever-moving columns?

SOUTHERN UNIONISM.

I have appealed to the thoughtful, candid people of the South, knowing well how useless it is to expect anything from the others. Passion has reigned too long, prejudice is too firmly rooted and nurtured with too much blood. There are those who, like the prophet by reason of his gourd, think they do well to be angry. Their madness is incurable. They never were good citizens, and they never will be. The best thing they can do, then, for themselves and the country is to die; the next best is to emigrate. Here they can be neither happy nor useful. The number of these I would fain believe to be small, confined principally to the original fire-eaters and the hopeless politicians. But there is all over the South a numerous element whose peculiar experiences should make them not only our best citizens, also, the most "radical" in their views, using that word as it is generally used to denote hostility to the rebellion and its principles; in other words, opposition to the "lost cause." This comprises the old Whigs and Unionists. They resisted secession and disunion when they appeared in the guise of the southern Democracy, and by success were very powerful if not respectable. They denounced with prophetic sagacity the very evils we have suffered as the result of their political heresies. Though reduced at last to a constantly diminishing minority they continued their opposition, after successive defeats, quite down to the presidential canvass of 1860, which they contested with a zeal stimulated by the gloomiest forebodings in case of failure. In talents and moral power they were strong, and in numbers they were not weak. They carried by pluralities the States of Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky for Bell and Everett, upon the significant platform of "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws," and secured for the ticket respectable minorities in every southern State except South Carolina; while a small popular vote was cast for Mr. Lincoln in each of the States of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri. It is significant as showing the value of minorities under our system of government that neither of these last States could be drawn into the form of secession. In this House at that time there were fully twenty-five members elected distinctively as Unionists by southern constituencies, and in nearly every district a contest had been made on that issue for the seat. It does not alter the fact or diminish its value that many of these persons joined the rebellion and became prominent. Leaving out of view the turncoats, the Arnolds, the Judases that are found everywhere, fear, despair, personal attachment, local sympathy moved men against their convictions and moral judgments. They followed leaders that they despised into a service that they loathed. Others yielded a passive acquiescence, under more or less constraint; perhaps lent assistance to their sons and other kindred in the rebel army. At the close of the conflict they found themselves in the same condemnation with the original secessionists who have labored diligently to prevent their being distinguished from them. There is also a class pretty numerous in the border States who never joined the rebellion, but who opposed the leading measures for its suppression, especially every one that affected the condition of slavery. They have been represented in both Houses of Congress by gentlemen who have made their position well understood here; though professedly, and, I believe, really opposed to the rebellion, never giving a vote that the bitterest rebel would not have given. An insane fear of "Radicalism" and "negro equality" has driven all these men into a false position and ranged them among the supporters of the "lost cause." There is still another class always loyal, still truly so, who, nevertheless, are in doubt and are waiting for some new party that shall be more moderate than either, men of excellent lives, good citizens, prominent in the piping times of peace, but wholly unfit for a state of revolution and the rugged issues of war. They hoped much from the Philadelphia convention of August, 1866, and eagerly joined the Tennessee Conservative party of 1867, not perceiving that, like the recent New York convention, they were both efforts to weld the copperhead Democracy with the southern rebellion, using them as a solder. Both the Philadelphia and the Tennessee movements were failures; so will the New York convention be a failure. The copperhead Democracy and the southern rebellion will be reunited; they are reunited already only to perish together. Let them perish, why cumber they the ground? The control of this country or any considerable part of it they will never have. Then why should men join them now in the day of their defeat, their weakness, their disgrace, their demonstrated and admitted incapacity and demerit, who eschewed and avoided and stubbornly resisted them when in power and full of high pretensions, which, by actual trial have been proven hollow and miserably false? How can a southern Whig or Unionist, who would have esteemed it little less than a personal dishonor to have supported the Democratic party under the lead of its former chieftains, now surrender to the same party under its present leadership? How can he thus give the lie to all the professions of his past life? What mighty influences have accomplished this great moral transformation? Will it be said that in the choice of evils this is the least, that it is either the Democratic party or the Union Republican party?

THE UNION REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Agreed. And what is the Union Republican party that any southern man, certainly any southern Whig or Union man should hesitate to join it and to support it? It is the party eminently of success. Taking the Administration of the Government at a period of depression unexampled in our history, encountering obstacles of a character and magnitude that have proved fatal to all previous Governments, this party rallied to its support the numbers, the intelligence, and the worth of the country, and succeeded in overcoming all obstacles and in raising the Government to a height never before reached both in the confidence and affection of its own citizens, and in the respect and good-will of the other nations. Such a party has in its composition the elements of indestructible power. Its conceded ability to save the Government will prove sufficient to administer it. Those who seek for faults are very apt to find them. But what party that has been compelled to do so much has done so little to justify hostile criticism? What party ever solved, so many problems, so vast and so complicated, with so few mistakes?

As an example of successful administration the last eight years are without a parallel. Leaving out of account the civil war which raged for half the period, and the embarrassing controversy during the other half between the executive and the legislative departments, more has been achieved of positive enduring good, more to make the American thank God that he is an American. The homestead policy; the telegraphs across the continent and across the Atlantic; the four Pacific railroads projected, one of them almost completed; the large additions to our domain by peaceful and honorable negotiation; the rapid and substantial growth of our domestic industries under the influence of fostering legislation; a currency at once national, convenient, and popular; the number of immense bridges built and rebuilt, and other extensions of preëxisting means of intercommunication; the development of our vast mineral resources, and the enhanced dignity and profit of agricultural pursuits; these are some of the material results of this ascendancy that commend themselves to all alike. Not a few all over the South will breathe more freely that slavery has been ended, and with it untold anxieties, possible evils, and more important to the sensitive nature, the gravest responsibilities. There was always in the South no little anti-slavery sentiment, formerly outspoken and active, of late years silent and hopeless. As late as 1849 Mr. Clay, the great Whig leader, publicly advocated gradual emancipation and urged its adoption into the new constitution of Kentucky. He was always an emancipationist. The end of slavery was a necessity of the war; the protection and enfranchisement of the colored race were but the logical sequel.

In this connection the great improvements of the national capital should not be overlooked. One of the most affecting proofs of sublime faith in our destiny was the daily click of the chisel upon the public buildings, never once intermitted during the war, even when the hostile flag was visible from the Dome of the Capitol. Our financial success was demonstrated by the increase of wealth and individual prosperity, while the enormous public demands never failed to meet a supply. A diplomacy, patient, forbearing, and always just, effectually defeating a predetermined intervention in our domestic strife, has at length achieved for us a place among the nations never reached before. No longer hostile or indifferent, each is emulous to outvie the rest in doing honor to our flag. Whatever this party has undertaken it has accomplished; whatever it shall undertake it will accomplish, so long as with faith and courage it adheres to the great principles of national union, individual freedom, and human progress. It is the party of the future, a live, not a lost cause.

But it was not of the general merits or the alleged demerits of the Union Republican party that I proposed to speak to-night. I have purposely limited myself to the aspects of the party as it is presented to the anti-secession part of the southern people and from their point of view. The character of a party usually appears in that of its representative men; I mean its chosen and not its self-appointed chieftains. The character of Mr. Lincoln, the first and greatest Republican leader, for those qualities which have secured for him an abiding place in the respect and affections of mankind, has already become historic. I turn to him who has been selected as the successor of Lincoln, the General of our armies, the invincible commander whose name stands as the synonym of victory.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

In the character of General Grant, his history and his acts, is found the best epitome of the party which I call upon the Union men of the South to support. Not a politician, never having held a civil office, as I ever heard, before the war, having withdrawn from the Army to private life when it seemed altogether improbable that the nation which had educated him would ever again become involved in war or have any further use for his services as a soldier, subsisting and supporting his family by unostentatious industry, devoting his leisure to a professional study of the theory of the great art for which he had been educated, but which it seemed not likely he ever would practice, there was, of course, little in his personal history, to say nothing of his politics, that a mere politician would find of any special interest. His political associations were with the old Whig party. His father was a Whig, and he was educated in that school and acted with the party, as long as it continued in organization. He is what, in the parlance of northern politics, is called an "Old-line Whig;" that is to say, one who was nurtured in the party and adhered to it until it went to pieces after the presidential election in 1852, and then, as between the Democratic and Republican parties, inclined to the former. In the race for Congress in the St. Louis district between Messrs. Barrett and Frank Blair, well recollected in this House, he voted for Mr. Barrett. Having in 1860 removed to Galena, Illinois, too recently to be a voter in the presidential election of that year, he took no part whatever in the contest. So much I have deemed it necessary, and it is all

I have deemed it necessary to say of General Grant's early political education and associations, knowing that an effort has been made to reconcile southern Whigs to the Democratic party by representing him as having always belonged to that party.

His career during the war is a large portion of its early, middle, and latter history, and can be known and read by all who do not remember it in any of the multiplied books already written. I refer to it not in demonstration of his great military qualities, but to invite the attention of the southern people to the display of generosity, liberality, and humanity which distinguished his movements from the day of his taking command at Paducah to the surrender at Appomattox Court-House. No chieftain gained such multitudinous victories; none used them with such forbearance. His study was to assert the authority of the Government, and to suppress the rebellion with the least practicable suffering, loss, and humiliation to the vanquished. This purpose is emphatically and tersely declared in his first proclamation, the one addressed to the citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, on taking command of that post in September, 1861. At this time the document is of great significance, and I give it entire:

PROCLAMATION.

To the citizens of Paducah:

I have come among you not as an enemy, but as your friend and fellow-citizen; not to injure or annoy you, but to respect the rights and to defend and enforce the rights of all loyal citizens. An enemy in rebellion against our common Government has taken possession of and planted his guns upon the soil of Kentucky, and fired upon our flag. Hickman and Columbus are in his hands. He is moving upon your city. I am here to defend you against this enemy, and to assert and maintain the authority and sovereignty of your Government and mine. I have nothing to do with opinions. I shall deal only with armed rebellion and its aiders and abettors.

You can pursue your usual avocations without fear or hindrance. The strong arm of the Government is here to protect its friends, and to punish only its enemies. Whenever it is manifest that you are able to defend yourselves, to maintain the authority of your Government, and protect the rights of all its loyal citizens, I shall withdraw the forces under my command from your city.

U. S. GRANT.

Brig. Gen. U. S. A., Commanding.

PADUCAH, September 6, 1861.

The siege of Vicksburg is too memorable to require or to justify more than an allusion. It resulted, you know, in the surrender of the city and its starving garrison of, I know not how many more than thirty thousand as prisoners of war.

Mr. LOGAN. Thirty-two thousand.

Mr. MAYNARD. Thirty-two thousand, says my friend, who was prominently and very honorably connected with that campaign. The terms of surrender were fixed by a convention between the two commanding generals, and I refer to it as an evidence of the forbearance, the generosity, and wonderful liberality with which he treated the men whom he had reduced into his power.

On the 3d of July, (the year was 1863,) General Pemberton proposed to General Grant an armistice "to save," so he said, "the further effusion of blood which must otherwise be shed to a frightful extent." General Grant declined the armistice, but said:

"The useless effusion of blood you propose stopping by this course can be ended at any time you may choose by an unconditional surrender of the city and garrison. Men who have shown so much endurance and courage as those now in Vicksburg will always challenge the respect of an adversary, and I can assure you will be treated with all the respect due to prisoners of war."

"By agreement," so runs the military record, "Generals Grant and Pemberton had an interview on this day at three o'clock p. m." This ended with the following paper, which, with few and slight modifications, contains the terms granted by the victor, which allowed his captive thousands to return to their homes instead of being marched away to military prisons. To appreciate fully, not only the humanity, but the grave responsibility assumed by this act of magnanimity to a defeated adversary, it is necessary to bear in mind the excited and embittered feeling, both in and out of the Army, growing out of the treatment of our men in southern prisons:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE,
NEAR VICKSBURG, July 3, 1863.

GENERAL: In conformity with agreement of this afternoon I will submit the following proposition for the surrender of the city of Vicksburg, public stores, &c., on your accepting the terms proposed. I will march in one division as a guard and take possession at eight a. m. to-morrow. As soon as rolls can be made out and paroles signed by officers and men you will be allowed to march out of our lines, the officers taking with them their side-arms and clothing, and the field, staff, and cavalry officers, one horse each. The rank and file will be allowed all their clothing, but no other property. If these conditions are accepted, any amount of rations you may deem necessary can be taken from the stores you now have, and also the necessary cooking utensils for preparing them. Thirty wagons also, counting two two-horse or mule teams as one, will be allowed to transport such articles as cannot be carried along.

The same conditions will be allowed to all sick and wounded officers and soldiers as fast as they become able to travel. The paroles for these latter must be signed, however, while officers are present authorized to sign the roll of prisoners.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT,

Major General.

Lieutenant General J. C. PEMBERTON, Commanding
Confederate forces, Vicksburg, Mississippi.

The surrender by General Lee of the great army of northern Virginia was another occasion in which were displayed the grand moral attributes which constitute the great warrior also a great man. On the evening of the 7th of April, (it is now 1865,) he addressed the following note to General Lee:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 7, 1865, 5 p. m.

The result of the last week must convince you of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the army of northern Virginia in this struggle. I feel that it is so, and regard it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood by asking of you the surrender of that portion of the confederate States army known as the army of northern Virginia.

U. S. GRANT,

Lieutenant General.

General R. E. LEE,

Commanding Confederate States Army.

This led to a meeting and to the acceptance of the following terms of surrender:

APPOMATTOX COURT-HOUSE, VIRGINIA,
April 9, 1865.

In accordance with the substance of my letter to you of the 8th instant, I propose to receive the surrender of the army of northern Virginia on the following terms, to wit: rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate, one copy to be given to an officer to be designated by me, the other to be retained by such officer or officers as you may designate. The officers to give their individual paroles not to take up arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander sign a like parole for the men of their commands. The arms, artillery, and public property to be packed and stacked and turned over to the officers appointed by me to receive them. This will not embrace the side-arms of the officers, nor their private horses or baggage. This done each officer and man will be allowed to return to their homes, not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as they observe their paroles and the laws in force where they may reside.

U. S. GRANT,

Lieutenant General.

General R. E. LEE,

Commanding Confederate States Army.

Another incident of the surrender, not appearing upon the papers, but well known to all present and to every soldier in the southern army, is thus related by an eye-witness:

"After the execution of the terms of surrender, General Lee remarked, in substance, to Grant: General, there is one thing I forgot to mention, and it is now probably too late to speak of it. By our service cavalrymen and some of the artillerymen own their horses. When General Grant, interrupting, said, in substance, that, such being the case, the men might retain their horses the same as was granted to the officers, and that he would so instruct his paroling officers. General Lee expressed with much emotion his gratitude at this exhibition of Grant's promptitude in anticipating his wishes, and remarked that this generous act would go far toward reconciling the minds of the southern people toward the North. The arrangement was faithfully carried out."

The value of this last act of generosity, outside of the stipulations already agreed upon and signed, is not likely to be underestimated by the paroled soldiers who were permitted to retain for the purposes of peaceful life the faithful animals which had borne them in safety through the foray of many a battle-field. If perchance my words shall reach beyond the narrow limits of this Hall to any portion of the southern people, I would ask them to read again those extraordinary conditions accorded to an utterly defeated foe. Was ever conqueror so gentle? Was ever victory so graceful? War lost half its horrors by staying the carnage which proverbially begins when resistance is done. A generous, high-souled people can never forget or fail to appreciate one who wielded such irresistible power with more than a father's tenderness.

But he did not cease caring for his adversaries after their surrender, and when his own fame was so noised that smaller men would have found time for little else than to listen. As early as the 16th of May, 1865, he sent to General Halleck a dispatch, in cypher, from which I take the following passage:

"Although it would meet with opposition in the North to allow Lee the benefit of amnesty, I think it would have the best possible effect toward restoring good feeling and peace in the South to have him come in. All the people except a few political leaders in the South will accept whatever he does as right, and will be guided to a great extent by his example."

Again on the 13th of June he received from General Lee a letter, inclosing an application to the President for pardon. He made upon the letter an indorsement, of which I give the main portion. It is a striking instance of that downright honesty which in statesmanship, no less than in private affairs, is always the best policy:

"In my opinion, the officers and men paroled at Appomattox Court-House and since, upon the same terms given to Lee, cannot be tried for treason so long as they observe the terms of their parole. This is my understanding. Good faith as well as true policy dictates that we should observe the conditions of that convention. Bad faith on the part of the Government, or a construction of that convention subjecting officers to a trial for treason, would produce a feeling of insecurity in the minds of all paroled officers and men. If so disposed they might even regard such an infraction of terms by the Government as an entire release from all obligations on their part."

"I will state, further, that the terms granted by me met with the hearty approval of the President at the time and of the people generally."

We cannot forget that Mr. Lincoln was the President of whom he speaks, and that his "heartly approval" of the convention at Appomattox Court-House was one of the closing acts of his illustrious life. The indorsement upon the application for pardon I give entire:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES, June 14, 1865.

Respectfully forwarded through the Secretary of War to the President, with earnest recommendation that the application of General Robert E. Lee for amnesty and pardon may be granted him. The oath of allegiance required by recent order of the President to accompany application does not accompany this for the reason, as I am informed by General Ord, the order requiring it had not reached Richmond when this was forwarded.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

He did not stop here his interference, in behalf of those to whom he had plighted his own honor and the faith of the nation. At an earlier period, during the present Congress, it became necessary for a committee of this House, charged with an important investigation, to examine General Grant as a witness. The inquiry touched the President's treatment of the vanquished rebels. I read from the testimony as given before the committee. General Grant, speaking of his interviews with President Johnson during the summer of 1865, said:

"I frequently had to intercede for General Lee and other paroled officers on the ground that their parole, so long as they obeyed the laws of the United States, protected them from arrest and trial. The President at that time occupied exactly the reverse grounds, namely, that they should be tried and punished. He wanted to know when the time would come that they should be punished. I told him not so long as they obeyed the laws and complied with the stipulation. That was the ground that I took. The conversations were frequent after the inauguration of Mr. Johnson. I cannot give the time. He seemed to be anxious to get at the leaders to punish them. He would say that the leaders in the rebellion must be punished and that treason must be made odious. He cared nothing for the men in the ranks—the common men. He would let them go; they were led into it by the leaders. He claiming that the time must come when they could be tried and punished, and I claiming that that time could not come except by a violation of their parole. I claimed that I gave them no political privileges, but that I had a right, as military commander, to arrange terms of surrender which should protect the lives of those prisoners."

This testimony was taken and put upon record more than one year ago. The sentiments, acts, and opinions of General Grant were well known to the whole Union party the country over. Still with a unanimity that has hardly been equaled, excepting, possibly, in the case of General Washington, the first President, and Mr. Lincoln, the last, he was selected by that party as their candidate; their convention at Chicago not going there, to nominate him, but to ratify the nomination that had already and for months been made by the people. There was no juggling there, no paltering with words in a double sense, no mockery of pretending to decline honors the more effectually to mislead aspiring rivals, and consequently no heartburnings over thwarted hopes.

Now, I appeal to the men of the South, to men of all parties, who pray with Grant "let there be peace," who wish to see the prostrations of war lifted up, and your land recover from the sad effects of the struggle, can you find anywhere, in any condition of things, so much of promise, so much to encourage and console, so little of bad faith, so little to repel, so little to wound your self-respect or to remind you of an unsuccessful past, as in this great chieftain and the party of which he is the acknowledged and accepted head.

I know you will be told differently; I know that you have been so told; I know that you have been taught to hate the Radical party, as his supporters are called; that they have been maligned and arraigned, that they will continue to be, but not by the true friends of the southern people. It will be by the same class, mostly by the same men, who for years were active in arraying the southern against the northern people; the same men who always found it convenient to exhibit every unpalatable sentiment, every extreme opinion, every obliquity of conduct, every short-coming or over-doing reported in any corner of the vast and populous North, as characteristic of a distinct, hateful, and contemptible race. These men have always fastened upon some northern name to hold up continually to the public gaze as monsters of power and wickedness, types of all that is abominable in principle and fiendish in practice. There are some still living who can remember when all through the South the great name of Alexander Hamilton was a by-word of opprobrium and execration; and after him Timothy Pickens, the "blue-light" Federalists, and the Hartford convention. Daniel Webster succeeded to the inheritance of calumny and popular abuse. Then the great names of sorcery and evil omen were Seward, Giddings, Greeley, and abolitionism. At the present moment the hate-inspiring word is radicalism, and the execrated men are Charles Sumner and Old Thad Stevens. Will a deceived people never grow wiser, and learn to detect and despise such abominable trickery?

Mr. MULLINS. What do they say of Brownlow?

Mr. MAYNARD. He being native there and to the manner born falls into the class of "scalawags," the home-made Yankees, the traitors to the South, like my colleague himself.

SCHUYLER COLFAX.

Associated with General Grant, second on the ticket, as candidate for Vice President, is one well known, long the favorite of his party, not only for his amenity and the general excellence of his character, but for the signal industry and ability which he brings to the management of public affairs. I need not say to you, sir, for the moment occupying his chair as the Presiding Officer of this body, that I allude to SCHUYLER COLFAX. An old acquaintance and personal friend, I will not trust myself to speak of him in such terms, as I could readily command lest the warmth of friendship should transport me beyond the limits of decorum and the prescribed rules of congressional debate.

An old Whig of the strictest sect, educated in the best school of the politician, the American press, such he was when I met him for the first time, in June, 1852, at the Maryland Institute, in the city of Baltimore. We were both members of that memorable Whig convention, the last that ever assembled, which nominated General Scott, the last Whig candidate, for the Presidency. It was an imposing assemblage; the noblest of the land were in conclave; the loyal, patriotic, Union-loving. The fervor of their protestations for the Union betrayed a strong consciousness of its imminent perils. As became young men in our novitiate, we were listeners and lookers on. Neither of us, nor others not a few, young and silent like ourselves, but since prominent before the country, have ever forgotten or disregarded the inculcations of that final gathering. The end of the grand old party was worthy of its career. It went down as the Cumberland went down, with the flag flying and the men at the guns. Of the party no less can be said than that no man was ever ashamed to have belonged to it.

Upon its dissolution Mr. COLFAX joined the Republican party, of which he at once became and continues a conspicuous leader; and the history of the party is his history. A few cardinal facts are all that is necessary to illustrate both his great personal popularity and his official success. As indicative of the former, it is not unworthy of the occasion to remark that more children, I venture to say, have been named for him than for any other living man, or for any dead man, except, perhaps, General Washington and General Jackson. By consecutive service he is all but the oldest member of the House, has filled the chair of the Presiding Officer of this body longer than any man except Henry Clay. His position as Speaker has not prevented him, whenever a bill has been offered in the House relieving from political disabilities persons involved in the rebellion, from casting his vote in favor of it, against almost the entire delegation from his own State. Liberality, generosity, unwearied kindness have marked his official conduct no less than his private intercourse.

These are the men, such their characteristics, that have been selected by the Union Republican party as their representative and chosen leaders. And this stands out as a fact, living, clear, bright, beyond all controversy and gainsaying, above all the denunciations and vituperations that have been or will be heaped upon them by political opposition.

CONCLUDING APPEAL.

Trusting that these humble words of mine may reach beyond the limits of this Chamber, perchance reach some portion of those for whom they are intended, I would ask whether their future, all they hope and expect, is not identified with the cause and the party which they have been taught to distrust and withstand.

I submit to the old Whigs and to the Union men of the South what have they to gain, suppose the ticket nominated the other day at New York should succeed. Suppose that old party which dominated the country before the war should again become lord of the ascendant, do they suppose for a moment that they would be among the favored ones? They would be sent to the rear along with the other prisoners, or, may be, permitted to take their share with the retainers and camp followers. The men who would come in for the chosen places, and occupy the chief seats would be a very different class of people. If during the period of reconstruction any of them have perchance been put forward and have been favored it has been but for the time, and as a means of bridging over the chasm. Another class of men have sought by passing over their backs, making as it were a pontoon of them, to secure for themselves the supreme control, to which unaided they aspire in vain. When the fox escaped from the well, by the aid of the silly goat, he left him to perish, having no longer any use for him.

On the other hand, suppose they support General Grant: when he shall be elected President, as the omens all declare he will be, these men, the old Whigs and the Union men of the South—names in most instances, perhaps, synonymous, but not so universally, because there were Whigs who are not Union men, and there are Union men who were not Whigs—will naturally be intrusted with the control of public affairs in that portion of the country. Their cherished principles will then be triumphant, their teachings will at last be listened to with honor and respect. The recollection of what they said in the old times and the fulfillment of their dark predictions will give to their counsels for the future a degree of confidence and influence which no others will enjoy, especially those whose baleful precepts have clothed the land in mourning. Their natural associations are with this great party of the future. With their opponents they will never be at home, never be cordially received. This party, with these leaders, will give them welcome and admit them to a full participation in its affairs. They will no longer compose the hopeless minority to which for many years they have been condemned.

If, therefore, they are wise, if they are prudent, wise and prudent for the highest good of their country, even in the narrower and lower wisdom which looks alone to personal interest and self-advancement, they will discard that ominous thing, that "cause" of the devil which has loomed before them these last eight years as a terror and a trouble; they will condemn it, spurn it, and will strike hands with the friends of freedom and of free government all over the country; they will grasp the old flag-staff; they will rally to the old national airs; they will again keep step, as of old, to the music of the Union.

APPENDIX.

Since the preparation and delivery of this speech an official report has come to hand, dated June 30, 1868, made to the constitutional convention of Texas by its committee on lawlessness and violence. It is a collection of statistics from the records of the State Department, the records of the office of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the sworn statements of competent and reliable witnesses. I make a few extracts and then leave them without comment:

"We have directed our investigations to the homicides committed during the period of time intervening between the close of the rebellion and the 1st of June, 1868; and, from the three sources of information mentioned, we present the following statistics of homicides in Texas:

	Whites.	Freedmen.	Total.
Killed in 1865.....	39	38	77
Killed in 1866.....	70	72	142
Killed in 1867.....	166	105	271
Killed in 1868.....	171	133	304
Year unknown.....	24	21	45
Of unknown race.....	-	-	40
Total.....	470	429	899

making a grand total of nine hundred and thirty-nine homicides committed in Texas since the conclusion of the war, June 1865, to June 1, 1868, including a few cases casually reported in the present month. This gives an average of three hundred and thirteen per year.

"Of these nine hundred and thirty-nine homicides, there were—
By whites, 464 whites, 373 freedmen, total, 833.
By freedmen, 10 whites, 43 freedmen, total, 53.
And by parties whose race is unknown, 43."

"Many of these homicides have doubtless been committed for purposes of plunder and robbery. The facts and the testimony show that many of our highways are infested by bandits who will take life for a horse or a pistol or a purse. These desperadoes, with very few exceptions, were either confederate officers or soldiers or bushwhackers during the late war, and now constitute one of the legitimate entailments of secession and rebellion. It is also true that many of these homicides have resulted from private quarrels. There is much bad blood in the land. But this wholesale killing cannot be accounted for by either or both of the causes named. The figures themselves shed some light on this subject. During the last three years, according to the reports consulted, three hundred and seventy-three freedmen have been killed by whites, while only ten whites have been killed by freedmen. Now it cannot be that all these colored people, or any considerable number of them, were murdered for their money; their extreme poverty forbids the supposition. Neither can it be that many of them were slain in personal altercations with whites; for in that event, there should have been as many whites killed by freedmen as freedmen by whites, the freedmen being it is said, generally as well armed as the whites. This great disparity between numbers of the two races killed, the one by the other, shows conclusively that 'the war of races' is all on the part of the whites against the blacks. The evidence in our possession also shows that a very large portion of the whites murdered were Union men, and that the criminals, with remarkably few exceptions, were and are disloyal to the Government."

"We have been challenged to produce cases of Union men and freedmen being persecuted for their loyalty. We now do so. Judge Black was a Republican; he was murdered in 1867 in Uvalde county by a rebel. Milton Biggs was a Union man, and had been appointed county judge of Blanco county; he was murdered in 1867 while plowing in his field, before he could qualify. Judge Christian, a loyal man, of Bell county, was pursued into Missouri, and murdered by a party of rebels. Mr. Wade and seven other gentlemen were killed in Lamar county last year for their Unionism. Four men were recently murdered in the county of Hunt, and six in Bell county, for their loyalty. Within the present month the county judge and the district clerk of Hunt county have been driven from their homes, and compelled to fly for their lives because of their unyielding attachment to the Government. Hundreds of loyal men, to our knowledge, are at this time forsaking their homes in Texas, fleeing from the assassin, forced away by rebel intolerance. And we here put it to record that honorable members of this convention are to-day exiles from their firesides and dare not return to their families, for the only reason that they will not forswear their principles. Now, while it remains true that the Union men of Texas constitute a very small proportion of the white population, and while it is true that they are being killed by rebels, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that they are killed for their Unionism. In other words, if they are rebels they would not be killed."

"And when we come to examine the persecutions suffered by the freed people, the mass of testimony is so overwhelming that no man of candor can for a moment question the statement that they are, in very many parts of the State, wantonly maltreated and slain simply because they are free and claim to exercise the rights of freemen. Some months ago, in Panola county, a party of whites rode up to a cabin wherein some freed people were dancing, and deliberately fired upon them, killing four, one a woman, and seriously wounding several others. In 1867, in Dewitt county, a white man met a black man riding, and asked him what he was going to do with the whip he held in his hand, and on being answered nothing, shot the freedman, killing him instantly. In the county of Fort Bend, last year, a white man was riding through town, and on seeing a negro man standing on the steps of the office of the Freedmen's Bureau he drew his revolver and shot him dead. The criminal had never seen or spoken to the freedman before. In Newton county, 1867, a white man met a colored man driving a team; the former made the freedman get out of his wagon, and then shot him seven times in cold blood. In Fort Bend county, same year, the freed people were holding a fair to procure funds to finish their church, and while they were singing a hymn, two white men rode by and fired their pistols into the church."

"In October, 1867, a white man was traveling in Grayson county and met a freedman; after passing him a few yards, he turned and fired upon him, hitting him in the back. The freedman died in a few hours; he had not spoken a word to the murderer—had never seen him before. But a few days ago a party of white men assaulted the family of an unfreeing freedman in Falls county, killing and dangerously wounding another freedman. In the same county, a few weeks ago two armed white men, in open day, went to the house of a colored man, and without any provocation murdered him. Soon after this, a white man, in the same neighborhood, rode up to two freedmen, and, without any known cause, shot one of them dead and fired at the other. Last week the colored registrar in Burleson county was found murdered; and in January last the colored registrar of Milan county was called to his door at night and shot. And so the bloody story runs."

"A white boy, thirteen years old, was waylaid and shot, and severely wounded, by a man named Johnson, in Hopkins county. Johnson was arrested by the sheriff, a loyal man, brought before Judge Mayberry, of the eighth judicial district, found guilty of a simple assault, and fined ten dollars. The sheriff of Hunt county, a Union man, was resisted and shot while arresting a criminal; the said criminal was tried before the said Mayberry, bailed in a bond of $600, and is now at large. In another county a rebel murdered a boy not fourteen years old; he was tried and acquitted on the ground that he had lost an arm in the confederate service. In another case, a loyal man was assaulted with intent to kill by a rebel, and, after being fired at once, shot and killed his adversary. He was promptly arrested, and compelled to give bond for $50,000. Another loyal man was assaulted with deadly weapons three times by a party of rebels; he made oath to the facts before the proper authorities, but to this day the said authorities have refused to arrest the criminals, though well known to the sheriff."

Moreover, fuller reports show that since the policy of General Hancock was inaugurated, sustained as it is by President Johnson, the homicides in Texas have averaged fifty-five per month; and for the last five months they have averaged sixty per month."

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. BURLEIGH,

OF DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 21, 1868,

On the Indian affairs of the country.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to command the attention of men while discussing a question which they do not understand and in which they are not interested; especially is it the case in this House at the close of a protracted session. But, sir, there is one question of this character which is of the greatest moral and financial importance to the country, to which you, as faithful legislators, can neither close your eyes nor ears, a question which now presents itself and offers to this Government the alternative of peace and tranquility, or a long and costly war. I allude to our present relations with the Indian tribes of the country.

For years past, while Congress has been devising means to keep up our national finances, millions upon millions of money have been expended in the support of western armies whose sole duty it has been to preserve peace with the Indian tribes and protect the frontiers.

It was not until the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that any well devised, practical plan was adopted which looked to the ultimate and final settlement of this important question. Having become satisfied that some decisive step must be taken by the Government to put an end to the murderous warfare that was going on upon our western frontiers, and stop the monstrous drain upon the Treasury of the nation which this war produced, Congress appointed a commission and charged it with the important duty of proceeding to the Indian country to ascertain the cause, and, if possible, put an end to these disturbances. This commission was composed of Generals Sherman, Harney, and Terry, Senator HENDERSON, Commissioner Taylor, General Sanborn, and Colonel Tappan.

In accordance with their instructions these commissioners proceeded to the Indian country—visited most of the hostile tribes—held frequent and protracted councils with their most influential chiefs and head men, and discovered (just what every intelligent frontiersman knew before) that the war was waged by the Indians in consequence of the invasion of their country by the white man. There is nothing new or strange in this. It is the old conflict renewed. The inevitable result of the juxtaposition of dissimilar races, with a determined effort on the part of the stronger to overpower and destroy the weaker. The result will be, as it ever has been, the triumph of the superior and the extermination of the inferior race if they remain together. All or nearly all of our Indian troubles have resulted from the invasion of their country by the whites, and there will be no permanent peace until the two races are separated or until one of them is exterminated.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Indian Affairs—Mr. Burleigh.

HO. OF REPS.

American enterprise first led our people around Cape Horn to the golden shores of California. They soon made up their minds that a shorter route must be found, and they crossed the Isthmus of Darien; but twenty days' time was of too much value to be lost and they demanded a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

To-day, sir, there are seventy-five thousand Indians roaming over the plains of the West between the Missouri river and the Rocky mountains in search of food and clothing. These are the Indians with whom our frontier settlers and miners have come in contact. It is through the country which they occupy, and which their ancestors occupied from time immemorial; it is through these plains, over these mountains that your two great railroads to the Pacific are now being so rapidly constructed. Thoroughfares of greatest national importance, the creations of American enterprise, surpassing in permanency of character and rapidity of construction anything which the world has heretofore witnessed; and when completed, will have cost the Government more than one hundred million dollars, and will be very cheap at that. It is over this country that all of the mighty commerce of the plains is carried on; it is through this country that tens of thousands of our citizens are daily passing and repassing to and from the mountains, the mountain cities, and the Pacific. But one year ago where now stands the beautiful city of Cheyenne there were encamped several thousand hostile Indians. Not a white man had a shelter there. To-day that "magic city" can boast of an intelligent, enterprising population of more than six thousand souls, with its schools, churches, hospitals, three daily papers, to say nothing of its weekly, commercial, agricultural, and religious publications. What is true of Cheyenne to-day will in a few short months be equally true of a dozen other cities between that point and Salt Lake.

Now, sir, this commission, composed as it is of upright, faithful men, having no other desire than to meet and settle this question, found the strong columns of western emigration forcing their way into the heart of the Indian country. The Indians resisted their advance, hence the conflict which followed. The commissioners became satisfied that it was impossible to secure a permanent, lasting peace with these people so long as they remained in contact with our own, each contending for the occupation of the country. The white man's foot had trodden the soil, his strong hand had already grasped the prize, and he would not relax his hold. This was the condition of things when they first visited these tribes and commenced their work of pacification. Having surveyed the field thoroughly and satisfied themselves of the true condition of things, the commissioners could discover no other practical plan for a final settlement of our Indian troubles but to remove them from the line of these roads and the mining districts of the country, and locate them upon reservations remote from these points, where they are to remain by themselves unmolested by our people. They next proceeded to negotiate treaties with all of these tribes, by the terms of which the Indians agree to abandon the whole middle belt of the country, cease their warfare upon our people, and go and remain upon the reservations which the Government should set apart for them, and there adopt the habits of civilized life. These treaties also provide that the United States shall aid the Indians by feeding and clothing them, provide them with cattle and agricultural implements, and give them such assistance as they need while in the transition state from savage to civilized life.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said for and against the operations of this peace commission; but I tell you, sir, that from my knowledge of these Indians, and a pretty thorough acquaintance with the plan adopted and carried out by the commissioners, that it is, in my judgment, the only one that promises a full and final adjustment of these difficulties. We have but the alternative to sustain their labors, abandon the country, or wage and prosecute a war of extermination against these people. This latter course cannot for a moment be thought of. The wrath of Divine justice would be poured out upon us as a nation if we determined upon an act so wicked. The civilization of the age would not tolerate it, while the sensibilities of the Christian world would revolt at such a thought.

But, aside from the moral question, it would bankrupt the national Treasury to maintain upon the plains and in the mountains of the West a hundred regiments of mounted men for the space of five years. I am confident that the work of extermination, or even the subjugation of these tribes by military force would require a much larger force and greater length of time than I have named. I am not unmindful of the fact that the adoption of the plan which has been inaugurated by the peace commission will largely increase the appropriations needed for our Indian service. Some may regard it as extravagant; but so far from this, so far from squandering the public moneys, I am confident that if it is carried out promptly and in good faith by the Government, it will be found one of the wisest and most economical measures which has received the consideration of this Congress. That the early appropriation of $2,000,000 to enable the peace commission to go forward and complete the great work which they have so successfully begun, will save to the national Treasury $20,000,000 a year, I have no more doubt than I have of my own existence, to say nothing of the suffering that will be prevented and the hundreds of human lives that will be saved to society and friends.

It is for the protection of life and property in the West against the hostility of these Indians, and for no other purpose, that we are to-day maintaining in that part of the country an army of about sixteen thousand men, at a yearly cost of $24,000,000.

If these Indians were removed and located in other parts, as the commissioners recommend, you can then without danger disband this army and save these millions to the Treasury. I do not wish to be understood as finding fault with either the character or management of our military authorities either here or in the West. I believe they discharge their duties with the utmost ability and fidelity. I know General Augur, who commands the department of the Platte, which embraces a very large tract of Indian country. I know him well, and I do not believe that a purer patriot, a braver soldier, a more honest, upright man can be found in either public or private life.

As for General Terry, who commands the department of Dakota, where I reside, I will only say that he needs no applause or commendation from me. The transactions of his whole past life, both civil and military, have made for him a history of which any citizen or soldier might well feel proud. I might go on and pay a merited tribute to the patriotism and fidelity of many other officers in that country, but this is not the object of my remarks. What I desire is to let this House and the country understand that I object to continuing the miserable line of policy which the Government has heretofore pursued in its abortive efforts at settling our Indian difficulties—a line of policy which has been persisted in year after year without having accomplished a single useful, practical, desirable result.

Perhaps it may be thought by some gentlemen here that I have overstated the number of troops and the cost of keeping up our frontier military establishment in the Indian country. To such I will say that I am far below the actual mark: I have in my remarks confined myself to the military posts in the vicinity of the two Pacific railroads.

The response of the Secretary of War to a resolution of the House, of recent date, shows the force now actually employed along the line of these two roads east of Salt Lake to be—

Companies.....	181
Commissioned officers.....	607
Enlisted men.....	15,070
Total.....	15,858

The cost to the Government of maintaining this force in that remote country will not fall one dollar short of $24,000,000 a year.

Now, sir, this Indian question is the one which this Congress is called upon to meet and settle at this time. It must be met and settled now, or we shall have another Indian war before the close of this year—a war which will involve the whole extent of our frontiers from the British lines to the Gulf of Mexico, more savage in its character, more disastrous in its consequences, more costly in its prosecution, than any which has ever preceded it. They will take possession of your great overland lines of travel; tear up and destroy your Pacific railroads, drive in the frontier settlements, and entail upon the Federal Government an expense which can hardly be estimated. In fact, sir, I should not be surprised at any moment to hear that the conflict had begun. These treaties, which were concluded many months ago, are not yet ratified by the Senate. The means have not been placed at the disposal of the commission to enable them to redeem their pledges made to this people.

Less than eight weeks ago General Augur stated to me that if the treaties which the peace commissioners had concluded with the Indians of the Platte were not promptly fulfilled on the part of the Government we should again become involved in war with those tribes, and that he could not protect the line of the Union Pacific road alone with forty thousand troops.

General Sherman has written these things time and again. He has laid before the Government his views upon this subject, which are the result of close personal observation, and warned you, gentlemen, of the coming storm unless these Indians are removed and our treaties with them are carried out in good faith. If after having made these solemn treaties, and waited month after month for their fulfillment, suffering as they now are, these Indians again make war upon the inhabitants of the West, the guilt will attach to you who hold the purse-strings of the nation, and not to this commission, who have done their duty so well, nor to the Indians, who have trusted to the promises of your delegated agents; every one of which was made in good faith, but failed on your account. Our people have taken forcible possession of their country. We have driven off their game and reduced them to the very verge of starvation; yet, sir, by way of recompense, we have done nothing to teach them the arts of civilization.

As a people we have trodden them under our feet; we have robbed them of their birthright; and I say to you here that if this Congress adjourns without making an appropriation large enough to enable the peace commissioners to redeem the pledges which they have made these Indians, and by which our Government is in honor bound, these tribes will be forced to either rob and plunder our people or starve like dogs. The cravings for food when starvation stares its victim in the face have proven too strong for the moral sensibilities of civilized man, to say nothing of the savage. Already this commission has saved $10,000,000 to the Treasury, as will be seen by examining General Grant's estimate for the support of the Army for the present fiscal year. Its members have visited these hostile tribes in person. They have assured them that if they would cease hostilities toward our citizens the Government, by whose authority they were acting, would make liberal treaties and fulfill them to the letter. Generals Sherman and Harney, as did the other commissioners, gave their personal assurances to the Indians that these things should be done; and, sir, Congress cannot with any degree of propriety adjourn without appropriating this money. To do so would be an insult to these commissioners and disgrace this body.

The old stereotype plea, that "If the money is appropriated it will be stolen," will not answer here. The brave Lieutenant General who, upon a hundred battle-fields, has bared his breast to the iron hail of death for his country's sake, who has directed the expenditure of untold millions of the public treasure, is not the man to countenance anything of the kind; and I venture the assertion that the individual does not live who dare approach either Harney or Terry with a proposition that savors of corruption. It would require stronger evidence than I have ever yet heard to satisfy me that a single dollar of the money which was placed in the hands of this commission has either been squandered or misapplied, or that either of its members would be guilty of such an act.

Now, sir, I have to say in conclusion, that justice to these Indians, economy in administering the affairs of the Government, security to the lives and property of our citizens, the growth and prosperity of the great West, all demand the settlement of our Indian difficulties; and to this end I ask that our treaty stipulations with these tribes be carried out in good faith, and that the necessary amount of money for this purpose be at once appropriated.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN COVODE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 24, 1868,

On the bill to provide for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, having no ambition higher than that of a practical and useful legislator, I have not sought to obtrude my opinions upon the attention of the House concerning the many grave and important questions which have excited such deep and pervading public interest during this session. Still, I have followed them with earnest anxiety in all the varying and stirring phases through which they have passed, and my recorded votes during a long period of struggle and difficulty between the Executive on the one side, sustained by all the powers and patronage which he controls, and the people's representatives on the other, must speak for me in the place of professions, which are easily made and as readily forgotten. Our acts are more enduring than our words, and in referring to my votes I have the consciousness at least of having endeavored to do right, and am willing to confront all the responsibility which they involve.

The people whom I have the honor to represent have large material interests, the prosperity of which greatly depends upon the wise and fostering legislation of Congress. They seek no undue privileges, and desire no unreasonable protection. All that they ask is that their honest labor shall not be reduced by a false and pernicious policy to the level of the pauper labor of Europe, with its ignorance, poverty, and degradation. They believe, as I do, that the encouragement of our home industry is the true path to national greatness, the best bond of real union, and the only certain means of restoring the national credit. Entertaining these convictions, my best efforts have been exerted to promote a policy which would give them a practical effect and carry out in detail the benefits which that policy is intended to secure to American labor.

Various causes which are well understood by the country have prevented Congress from perfecting such a tariff bill as the friends of protection desire and intend to pass. But much progress has been made in shaping the measure, which will be brought forward in December next, and under circumstances far more advantageous than now exists. In this connection it may be stated that my personal endeavors before the proper committee were successfully employed in retaining the existing rate of duty on coal against a powerful effort made to reduce it. And in the new bill reported to the House the duty on salt has been so raised as to benefit that interest considerably.

Without adequate protection the laboring man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow cannot be fairly rewarded for his toil. The cost of living and the prices of provisions have increased in a greater ratio than the wages of labor, consequently the miner, the coal-heaver, and the working masses generally have the greatest stake in the tariff.

And while upon this subject it is proper for me to call the attention of the House and of the country to a new combination that is now being formed to revive the reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces, which we succeeded in extinguishing not many years ago. If that scheme should succeed it would work immense injury to our laboring classes. The effect of such a treaty would be to admit the products of the low-priced labor of the British colonies into direct competition with our own better rewarded and superior labor, and to compel it to submit to the conditions of a system repulsive to every American instinct, or to remain idle.

For example, coal is now protected by a duty of $1 25 per ton in gold, which experience shows to be absolutely necessary to sustain the trade and to furnish the miners with fair wages. Reciprocity, as it is called, would destroy that interest or so cripple it as to involve the ultimate ruin of all enterprise in mining operations, by which thousands of families would be involved in poverty and distress. Lumber and agricultural products would also suffer in a corresponding degree. If we are to return to specie payments and to resume what may be called the normal condition of peace, it is absolutely necessary to reduce the extravagance and to lop off the excrescences which have grown out of the war. A disturbed condition of things, naturally incident to the close of so mighty a struggle as that through which the country recently passed, has withdrawn attention from those practical and economical questions that are so important in adjusting the operations of Government and its relations to the industry and enterprise of the people. The time has come when they must be considered, if we would preserve our credits and avoid the danger of bankruptcy.

The first step in this direction is to reduce the public expenditures to the actual wants of the Government, fairly and even liberally administered. Let us retrench, not in a narrow or niggardly spirit, but by striking off what is not really needed in the Army, the Navy, the Indian department, and the civil service. It is competent to reduce at least $50,000,000 a year in these different branches, which of itself would pay the interest on one third of our whole national debt, and thus diminish taxation to that extent.

The next step is to so modify and improve the tariff as that our home industry may be better encouraged and protected, and that excessive importations may be checked. Under the present system the day of specie payments is indefinitely adjourned and the hope of it is rendered both distant and dismal. Let us take a few startling facts to guide our conclusions in this matter. The official return of importations for the eleven months ending May 31, 1868, amounted to $223,241,447. Our exports for the same period summed up $163,249,520. By deducting the one from the other it will be found that there was a balance of trade against us in these figures of some sixty million dollars in round numbers. And the Treasury reports show that we actually exported $64,486,258 in gold to pay the difference during the past eleven months, thus exceeding by $20,000,000 the export in a previous period. Thus it is seen that we are daily draining the country of those precious metals which ought to form the reserve for resuming specie payments by importations that are destroying our own industry and enriching the manufacturers of Europe. It may be safely assumed that every dollar of the $75,000,000 of gold and silver produced in the United States goes abroad to pay for the extravagance and folly of our present ruinous system, to say nothing of the gold interest-bearing bonds which are constantly flowing in the same direction, and which are now held abroad to the extent of $700,000,000! This vast leak must be stopped or it will involve us in discredit and financial revulsion. No nation can continue to expend its resources without augmenting its production and expect to escape bankruptcy. The road to ruin is certain unless we produce what we need and save our capital to extinguish an oppressive debt. We are now burning the candle at both ends, and must soon expect to be without light. Last year we bought sixty-five millions more than our income allowed or our production could pay for, and in order to make the difference good we took that amount from our gold capital which should have been applied to the development of enterprise at home or to the reduction of the public burdens.

Our expenses are far greater than is consistent with the simplicity of republican institutions or with duty to ourselves, in view of the enormous debt and obligations which the rebellion entailed upon the nation. But they have been vastly augmented by the culpable misconduct of the Administration. Instead of seeking to retrench, and to economize, they have striven apparently to squander the revenues, and to consume the taxes, by the most willful and wanton system of prodigality. I will barely glance at a few examples of this deliberate wastefulness, for which no color of excuse can be found. The expenses of the Navy Department are not only extravagant, but they are wholly indefensible for a time of peace, and particularly so in view of the financial condition of the country. And this responsibility belongs entirely to the head of that Department. During the civil war, when rebel cruisers, built in England and France, were roaming the seas and destroying our commerce, that officer failed to furnish ships for the protection of that great interest, and the American flag was almost swept from the ocean. The diplomatic correspondence reveals the most culpable neglect and inefficiency in this respect, and when, finally, in answer to the urgent appeals of our ministers abroad, a few vessels were detailed for that service, they were not only unsuited to the duty, but no system was adopted by which their imperfect qualities might be made useful. Thus we had to struggle through the war.

But when peace came and when every dictate of prudence counseled retrenchment, what course did the Secretary of the Navy pursue? One of his first acts was to fit out a magnificent squadron for Europe, consisting of seven or eight ships, without the least necessity whatever. That squadron has been parading through the waters of Europe for now nearly three years, mainly on cruises of pleasure and at vast expense, every dollar of which might be saved by its recall. We did without it in war, and we can certainly dispense with it in peace. Our ministers and consuls, if they do half their duty, can give all necessary protection to commerce, and two steamers of ordinary size would make whatever patrol may be required. If other ships should by any emergency be needed they may be summoned by the Atlantic telegraph. The cable has materially changed the naval service on foreign stations, and we ought to profit by the new state of things.

But in addition to this large and prodigal outlay for the European squadron it is of public notoriety that the expenses have been shamefully augmented by a costly favoritism, practiced with the knowledge, if not with the privy, of the Secretary of the Navy and his subordinates. The headquarters of the squadron for Europe and Africa are at Lisbon, and numerous officers who have returned home bear witness to the fact that nearly all the coals and other supplies, instead of being purchased in open market and of regular dealers, as heretofore has been the practice, and, indeed, the duty prescribed to the paymasters, are now bought through a middle-man, who is an unscrupulous speculator, a native of Morocco, and a pet of the Department, at large advances. It can be established by the most positive proof that this adventurer, whom the Department has taken up with a full knowledge of his bad antecedents, received within the last two months four or five shillings a ton above the market price for furnishing the vessels of Admiral Farragut's squadron with coals. Contracts were made with him here in Washington without any regard to the fluctuation of prices abroad, so that while the very best coals were selling in the Tagus at twenty-two and twenty-three shillings per ton this favorite was obtaining twenty-six and twenty-seven shillings. These facts cannot be disputed, and I challenge inquiry into the subject. Another fact is worthy of mention in the same connection. The United States steamer Shamrock recently required to be calked and repaired. Instead of employing the regular workmen of Lisbon, who are among the most famous in the world for that particular branch of industry, this speculator was given the job, who employed incompetent mechanics and slighted the work, so that the ship had to put back and incur the expense of being refitted. The lives of the officers and crew and the safety of the ship were thus risked to serve a selfish interest.

But what renders this case still more glaring, outrageous, and offensive is the fact that this man was nothing but an adventurer two years ago, engaged in no respectable business, and was the keeper of a notorious drinking saloon. The Navy Department took him up and made him a favored contractor. He was employed by the late rebel agents to sell their coal to our Government, and it can be proved beyond controversy that a large supply of coals, procured for the use of rebel cruisers and blockade-runners, to destroy American commerce, was actually sold to our ships of war at a large advance upon the market price through this intermediary. The Navy Department was informed of this outrage by its own officers, and instead of investigating and correcting the fraud it encouraged the rascality. Let Mr. Welles deny it if he dare. Let him ask inquiry if he be honest. If the supplies for the European squadron were purchased in open market there would be twenty-five per cent. saved to the Government; but there is a venal "ring" established on the other side, corresponding to some here, and my belief is that the spoils are divided between those who make these contracts in Washington and those who receive the favors in Lisbon. We want no such squadron in Europe. It is a barefaced waste of millions. Recall the ships, arrange our finances, and when we are able to pay our debts let these cruises be resumed if they are needed. The same remarks apply to all other squadrons. They are all daughters of the same horse-leech, and cry for "More, more."

Enormous frauds have been systematically perpetrated in the Indian Bureau by collusion between the employes inside and the contractors and plunderers outside, forming together an organized "ring" to rob the poor Indians of their annuities and to steal the provision generously made by the Government for their support. We have endeavored to break up this infamous combination by directing the appropriations to be paid through the supervision of Lieutenant General Sherman. But in order to introduce effective retrenchment in this branch of the public service we must encourage friendly relations with the different tribes, settle them permanently where they can support themselves by industry and receive the benefits of civilization. Peace is cheaper than war, even if there was no moral consideration to induce the preference of one over the other. We are now keeping up a force on the plains equal to our whole Army before the rebellion, and at a cost of nearly twenty-five million dollars a year. Interested parties, contractors, jobbers, and the host of plunderers who profit by war are inciting the Indians to strife, and there is great danger, unless the wise measures of the peace commission are carried out, that a wide-spread outbreak of the western tribes may occur, which will add tens of millions to the debt, and necessarily to the burdens of the tax-payer.

The time has arrived when the regular Army must be reduced to the peace footing, and the multitude of unnecessary officers be lopped off. They should bear their part of the load like the rest of us, since as citizens they enjoy the same benefits. Seven of the States that engaged in the rebellion have been reconstructed, and are now represented in Congress with all the rights of other members of the Union. We have stood by them through all the trying ordeal of the last three years. We have sustained their hopes, relieved their wants, contributed to their necessities, and removed their political disabilities when it could be done with safety. The Army has been maintained until now, so that these people should not be exposed to the violence of unrepentant rebels. Let us get back to the ways of peace, and to the economy of peace. Standing armies devour the substance of any country that attempts to support them, and are besides a standing menace to the liberties of the people. Let us get rid of ours by a radical reduction, which will save twenty or thirty millions a year.

It is known to every member of the House that I have been most anxious to reduce in every possible way the expenses of the Government, and by that means to diminish the burdens of taxation. We have already cut down the taxes in many essential respects, and have prepared the way for a still further reduction. The corruptions which have grown into such formidable proportions of late years are among the most serious obstacles to an economical and honest administration of the Government. It is not unknown to the country that I have turned much attention to this subject, and have had occasion to expose the profligacy of that party which now seeks to regain power by these same bad agencies. During the present session the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has succeeded, with the support of Congress, in arresting various projected frauds upon the Treasury, by which hundreds of thousands of dollars were saved. And we have brought to light the outrageous manner in which contracts have been habitually let to the highest bidder instead of the lowest, because the contractor paid more money to the immediate friend of the head of the Department than the other bidders. This venal practice was illustrated in the case of the proposed jail for this city, the fraudulent contract for which was recently annulled by Congress upon my representation.

The unanimity by which a bill has just passed both Houses, vitiating a contract made by the Secretary of the Interior for a large supply of stationery, because it was far higher than the proposals of other bidders, and which was doubtless procured through the same influences that prevailed in the jail job—influences that figured largely in the New York convention in the double capacity of manager and candidate—gives encouragement that Congress will not tolerate in the future any of these corrupt combinations, whether they be sustained by high officers of the Government or engineered by their favorite tools.

A sense of duty, as well as a principle of retrenchment, compelled me from the outset to oppose the proposition to increase the pay of the employes in the public Departments twenty per cent. They are now receiving more than double the average price paid for the same number of hours of service in other occupations, the cost of which falls upon my constituents and others like them, who are more than sufficiently burdened already. This is not the appropriate time for raising salaries. On the contrary we ought to lower them wherever it be practicable, and I am quite ready to practice what I profess by commencing with our own pay. Let us prove our sincerity by divesting it of every suspicion of selfishness.

The issues placed before the country by the Chicago and New York conventions are not essentially different from those between Lincoln and McClellan in 1864. The two parties joined issue on the question whether the attempt to carry on the war for the preservation of the Union had or had not been a failure; whether it were wise to abandon it by electing McClellan, or preserve it by electing Lincoln. The masses of the people attached themselves to the patriotic side by electing Mr. Lincoln, which ended the contest in the field. The work of reconstruction was then undertaken by Congress, who soon found themselves confronted by the appalling fact that the man on whom, after the assassination of President Lincoln, devolved the duty of carrying out the laws of Congress, had allied himself with the party which only the fall previously had sought to terminate the contest by a separation or a surrender. And ever since the spring of 1865 the Republican party has had to carry on its work of reconstruction in the face of the most violent and dangerous opposition from the President of the United States, with whom the Democratic party was in entire sympathy. The vast executive power of the nation was all against us; the patronage of the Government, except as it has been curbed by the laws of Congress passed over presidential vetoes, has been exercised in aid of our enemies; all possible aid and comfort have been given to the rebellious element of the South in their resistance to the congressional policy of reconstruction; the finances of the country have been kept from settlement by discord between the several departments of the Government, and by the persistence of the President in keeping bad officers and ousting good ones; the General of the Army has been quarreled with, and a purpose has been manifested to lend military assistance to the attempt to establish the old rebel governments in the South; and, finally, in every possible way, and with too great a degree of success, the party which tried to stop the war in 1864 has tried to stop the work of peace and restoration from 1865 to 1868.

But they have signally failed, and the old oligarchy that so long ruled the Democratic party while it was in power has been routed in its strongest fortresses, and now while on its ruins have arisen free ballots, free education, a free press and free speech, what object can any patriot have to turn backward and regenerate that social and political power that can breed only disorder and war?

The approach of the election, however, brings us again face to face with the oligarchy, which seeks now not only to perpetuate the discords of the last four years by continuing the contest between the Executive and Congress, but openly avows its purpose to break up and utterly destroy the new order of things at the South, and to restore under the name of a white man's government the rule of the dangerous oligarchy which has already been so fatal to our prosperity and our good name. The declaration of the Democratic candidate for Vice President, General Blair, in his letter of July 3d, that "there is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments and elect Senators and Representatives;" and that "we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpations of Congress known as the reconstruction acts," is nothing more than the equally mischievous declaration of the platform just adopted by the New York convention, which pronounces the reconstruction acts "a usurpation, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void."

Horatio Seymour, more cautious than Blair, did not brave the bullets of his "friends" in the South, but while they were wrestling with our boys in blue at Gettysburg he inaugurated a riot in New York city, and the unwashed rebels, whom he addressed as "my friends," murdered near a thousand people and burnt $4,000,000 worth of property. Blair went to the front, but returned learning nothing, and forgetting nothing he offers his neck a willing victim for the yoke of the oligarchy, and seeks to become the leader in inaugurating a reign of terror in the southern States.

SPEECH OF HON. L. S. TRIMBLE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 21, 1868,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed, under the policy of our fathers, with a written Constitution as the guide for rulers and people in war and in peace, the rise and progress of a prosperous, great, and mighty people, with light and nominal taxation, which were fairly and equally imposed, with freedom from official meddling that made us the envy and admiration of the world. Sad and painful as it may be, oh, how terrible the change; for seven long, dreary years we have had war, strife, bloodshed, tyranny, and usurpation, led on by the policy of hate, the reward of which we are now reaping in unequal and oppressive taxes, grinding the very life out of the toiling millions who must continue to be the shield and protection of the Constitution and liberties of the people in the future as they have been in the past. The war has ended. More than three years ago the last confederate stacked his arms and gave a solemn pledge to the Constitution and for peace, which unwilling promise they have religiously observed. But peace has not returned. The flag of our Union was triumphant, but the Union is not restored. Our land is filled with widows and orphans; with mourning and distress. But anger, malice, and revenge are not softened, but revel in high carnival over forgiveness, mercy, and justice.

We hear much of congressional reconstruction. Congress alone stands in the way of a restored Union. They are entitled to the credit of dissolving the Union, blotting out ten States, erasing ten stars from that flag, establishing tyranny and despotism, denying the trial by jury, abolishing the writ of habeas corpus, suppressing free speech and free press, degrading white men upon the ruins of republican States, establishing despotic negro commonwealths. Was it for this our brothers suffered and died upon the battle-field? Was it for this fathers and mothers offered up their sons? No, sir. No, sir. Was the war waged to destroy the States, to make rulers of ignorant and degraded negroes, or was it carried on by the Government, as you solemnly declared, for the avowed purpose of maintaining the Union, and preventing disunion, to preserve the national authority throughout the entire country, to enforce obedience on the part of the revolted States to the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof? It was so declared in the celebrated Crittenden resolutions; it was declared by Congress, again and again; it was so declared by President Lincoln and Secretary Seward; it was expressly declared and reiterated by every speaker in the land who advocated the war, that the sole purpose and object of the war was to maintain the Union, not to dissolve and break it up, and by it to crucify the States and State constitutions. Without that declared purpose, I do not believe the support that was given to it could have been wielded in the manner that it was. Had the present purposes then been avowed as now, the State that I now in part represent, instead of furnishing seventy thousand men for the war, would have furnished one hundred and fifty thousand against it, for the Constitution and Union of our fathers.

If you desire peace, liberty, and a restored Union, unroll the Constitution; let it be read and obeyed by all men. You have sworn to support it; observe your oaths, give force and efficacy to its glorious guarantees, by yielding to the Executive the exercise of his high constitutional prerogatives. To that august tribunal, the Supreme Court, the power to shield and protect the weak and the innocent from the invasion of their constitutional and inalienable rights. Give that instrument a strict construction. For by the Constitution certain duties were imposed upon the several States, and the exercise of certain of their powers was restrained, which implied their continued existence as States. But to remove all doubt, an amendment was added which declared that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. The reserved rights of the States are treated by this Congress as nullities, not worth the paper on which they were written. I have ever believed, and sincerely believe to-day, that the only way or hope to save this Union and preserve the life of the Government will be to preserve inviolate the Constitution. Tell me not that you can preserve my life after you have torn out my heart. It is idle to talk of preserving this Government by overthrowing her Constitution.

Under no circumstances conceivable by the human mind have I, or would I, ever consent to violate that Constitution for any purpose. I will cling to it as the last hope of freedom, as the bond of unity in the past, as the only practical bond of union in the future; the only land lifted above the waters to which the ark of the Union can be moored. From that ark alone will go out the dove which shall return, bringing the olive branch of peace, and with it all the guarantees of constitutional liberty. The people of the State that I have the honor in part to represent are for peace, for the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof, as understood by our fathers and practiced by them. If this be a crime then have I offended. Why pursue and keep up the strife of the late terrible war. Let us act like patriots and statesmen; let by-gones be by-gones; let us act for the living with charity to all and malice to none upon living issues, issues upon which we are to be saved or lost as a nation. I entreat you to pause in your career of madness and folly, of unequal and unconstitutional legislation. Repeal your Freedmen's Bureau bill, your civil rights bill, your reconstruction acts, your tenure-of-office bill, your odious test-oaths. Grant a general amnesty. Make good your Crittenden resolutions. Declare to the South and the world that this is a republican Government in the true sense of that much abused term; that we derive our just powers from the consent of the governed.

Under our Constitution the powers of Government naturally assume a threefold form, legislative, executive, and judicial. A united and free Government can be organized only on the principle of separating those powers and assigning each class to a different and coördinate magistracy. Their union, however effected, and whether in one or a body of men, has been given by English as well as American statesmen to be the definition of a despotism. This partition has been made and guarded with jealous care by our Constitution. The legislative power has been vested wholly in Congress, the executive in the President, except the Senate shares with him the power to make treaties; the entire judicial power is vested in the courts, with the special designation of the Senate to try all impeachments. Neither Department has any authority to control or interfere with another in the performance of its functions. But the independent action of each was designed to check the abuse of power by the others. Let us faithfully adhere to these great fundamental principles, if need be with all the tenacity of life itself.

In defiance of these great principles citizens have been arrested without cause, without warrant, have languished and died in bastiles without trial, and in many instances, as I can testify, have never known what offenses were imputed to them. Congress has passed a law to take away from the citizen the appeal to the courts in cases touching their dearest rights. In ten States military power tramples the judiciary under foot. While you arraign the President for observing the Constitution you should be admonished the free white people of this great country are arraigning and impeaching Congress.

Sir, the people demand your impeachment and conviction upon the following articles, that you cannot deny, because they are true.

Sir, they can and will make a law unto themselves at the ballot-box. I read from the Democratic platform at New York, which I pray you heed, as follows:

"In demanding these measures and reforms we arraign the Radical party for its disregard of right and the unparalleled oppression and tyranny which have marked its career, after the most solemn and unanimous pledge of both Houses of Congress to prosecute the war exclusively for the maintenance of the Government, and the preservation of the Union and the Constitution.

"It has most repeatedly violated that most sacred pledge under which was rallied that noble volunteer army which carried our flag to victory. Instead of restoring the Union, it has, so far as in its power, dissolved it, and subjected ten States in times of profound peace to military despotism and negro supremacy.

"It has nullified the right of trial by jury.

"It has abolished the writ of habeas corpus, that most sacred writ of liberty.

"It has overthrown the freedom of speech and the press.

"It has substituted arbitrary seizures and arrests, and military trials and secret star-chamber inquisitions for constitutional tribunals.

"It has disregarded in time of peace the right of the people to be free from searches and seizures.

"It has entered the post and telegraph offices, and even the private rooms of individuals and seized their private papers and letters without any specification or notice of affidavit, as required by the organic law.

"It has converted the American Capitol into a bastille.

"It has established a system of spies and official espionage to which no constitutional monarchy of Europe would dare resort.

"It has abolished the right of appeal on important constitutional questions to the supreme judicial tribunals, and threatens to curtail or destroy its original jurisdiction, which is irrevocably vested by the Constitution, while the learned Chief Justice has been subjected to great and atrocious calumnies merely because he would not prostitute his high office to the support of the false and partisan charges preferred against the President.

"Its corruption and extravagance have exceeded anything known in history, and by its frauds and monopolies it has near doubled the burden of the debt created during the war.

"It has stripped the President of his constitutional power of appointment, even of his own Cabinet. "Under its repeated assaults the pillars of the Government are rocking on their base, and should it succeed in November next and inaugurate its President we will meet it as a subjugated and conquered people, amid the ruins of liberty and the scattered fragments of the Constitution."

While we have sat here, behold the spectacle witnessed in the other end of the Capitol. The majority of this House drag the Chief Magistrate of our country, who has been stripped of rightful power and manacled with degrading restraints, before a tribunal (if the majority here are to be believed) who had already prejudged his case before the charges against him were framed. What are these charges? He dares to do his duty to his country and his oath of office, to defend, preserve, and protect the Constitution of the United States, as he understood it. For trying to do this according to his conscience he is impeached. If the Executive may not appeal to the courts; if he may not at all times by speech or writing warn the people of the dangers which environ their rights and liberties, what protection is left to the humble citizen? This great trial has ended, be it said to the honor of the Senate, in the acquittal of Andrew Johnson, thus saving the country from humiliation and disgrace. May I not admonish you in all sincerity and kindness, that no brave or free people did or ever will submit long to such tyranny and usurpations and galling despotisms with such onerous taxes as are now being imposed by a minority of the whole people? We are all virtually slaves without proper representation. Our forefathers fought for representation. They established the principle by the offering of their lives and their blood that representation and taxation should go together. Is that principle less dearer to American free-men to-day? No, sir; it will continue to glow and burn until again enshrined in the hearts of every true American in the land, and woe to the man or party that stands in the way of this inalienable right. While the majority her deny to my native State, Kentucky her rightful Representatives on this floor, I trust that gallant people will never surrender that right to the dictation of a partisan Congress. But, if need be, assert it with the offering of their lives, their fortunes, and sacred honor. Who that realizes the moral accountability of nations can doubt that we have fallen upon evil days? In this great crisis, oh that some great and good voice that never counseled aught to dishonor or injure this Union would rise as if from the grave and expose the specious pretexts on which a further prosecution of this war is now being waged upon a brave and vanquished people.

May I not exclaim, "Save us from the awful consequences of our own passions, malignity, and crimes!" It was an axiom of the old Roman Senate that "Rome could not triumph over herself." She did. May we not beware? As said by me on a former occasion in this House—

"I am frank to say I do not believe that the people who, for four long years, held at bay, and often drove back, nearly one million Federal troops, can be reduced to subjection (by unconstitutional laws) and the negroes established as the dominant race. If so, they have degenerated from their noble ancestors who drove back the British at King's mountain and upon the plains of New Orleans."

Nay, more. Will two million and a half of free white men, who are the peers of any in this land in every way, submit to the enslavement of nearly one half the country, the destruction of the executive department of the Government, and the emasculation of the Supreme Court, the last citadel of liberty? Sir, if you do not intend to have a Union under the Constitution upon terms of equality, you had better at once consent to dissolve the Union in peace rather than force it, as you are now doing, and will if you continue in power.

If it is not out of order I will earnestly invite the majority on this floor to their wasteful and profligate expenditure of the public money.

From tables now before me the entire expenditure of the Federal Government from March 4, 1789, to 1st of January, 1815, to the close of and including the last British war, exclusive of the public debt was $172,697,779. Contrast this with the appropriations asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury for this year, as follows:

For the War Department, exclusive of bounties and pensions.....	$95,000,000
For the Navy Department.....	35,000,000
For civil service.....	51,000,000

Add to this for bounties, pensions, contingencies, Freedmen's Bureau, reconstruction, &c., at least.....	100,000,000
Aggregate at least.....	$232,000,000 for ordinary expenses of the Government.

For the present fiscal year, estimating our population at thirty millions, the people must be taxed about nine dollars and forty cents per capita, or about sixty dollars annually for each head of a family. I submit the following table showing the expenses of the General Government, exclusive of public debt, and the population shown by the census during each decennial year, from the foundation of the Government to the year 1868:

Year.	Expenses.	Population.	Rate per inhabitant.
1789-90 and 1791	$1,919,589 52	3,929,827	$0 48
1800.....	4,981,669 90	5,305,935	0 90
1810.....	5,311,082 28	7,239,814	0 73
1820.....	13,134,530 57	9,638,131	1 36
1830.....	13,229,533 33	12,866,020	1 03
1840.....	24,139,920 11	17,069,453	1 41
1850.....	37,165,990 09	23,191,876	1 60
1868.....	282,000,000 00	30,000,000	9 40

The foregoing shows that during Washington's administration the expenses of the Government amounted to but forty-eight cents per capita. In 1840, the last year of Van Buren's administration, to but $1 41 per capita, and in 1850 but to $1 60 per capita. They now, in a time of profound peace under Radical and negro rule, require of the people about nine dollars and forty cents per capita. The whole expenditures of the Government for the same service in 1860 (the last year of Mr. Buchanan's administration) were:

For civil list.....	$6,077,000
For the War Department.....	16,563,000
For the Navy Department.....	11,514,000

Total.....$34,154,000

Difference between the estimates for 1868 and actual expenditures for the same items in 1860.....$147,846,000

Difference between the estimates for 1868, after adding bounties, pensions, contingencies, Freedmen's Bureau, reconstruction, $100,000,000—which is a low estimate—making total for 1868.....$282,000,000
Expenditures for same items under Buchanan, 1860.....34,154,000

Difference.....$247,846,000

No small item to the tax-payer, including nothing for interest on the public debt, which is payable in gold, or the settlement of any of the just debts now repudiated by Congress and the Departments. There has been collected in the last three years from the people about sixteen hundred millions in the form of taxes without materially reducing the public debt or settling any of the outstanding debt. That Mr. DELANO, the chairman of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, announces on the floor of this House, would bankrupt the country if allowed, and that they amounted to a sum as large as the present funded debt. It is a grave question how long the people can or will raise these enormous sums by taxation for the luxury of Radical and negro rule. While I have been a member of this House I have upon all occasions voted against these violations of the Constitution, and against all measures calculated to rob the people of their honest earnings. So help me God, I will never vote one cent to tax the people or their charred ruins in Kentucky to pay any of this monstrous debt except that incurred in vindication of the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof.

The only remedy I can conceive for this and other monstrous evils will be found in the people of this great country once more rallying to the standard of the Constitution now sustained and borne aloft by those able, pure, and upright statesmen, Horatio Seymour and Francis P. Blair, who stand pledged to restore the Union and the Constitution with all their guarantees to each and every citizen, native and foreign born, in every State, in every district, in this great land, upon this platform of principles unanimously adopted at New York, a part of which I will read, as follows:

"1. Immediate restoration of all the States to their rights in the Union under the Constitution, and of civil government to the American people.

"2. Amnesty for all past political offenses, and the regulation of the elective franchise in the States by their citizens.

"3. Payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable; all moneys drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment, and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not, provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

"4. Equal taxation of every species of property according to its real value, including Government bonds and other public securities.

"5. One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the office-holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder.

"6. Economy in the administration of the Government; the reduction of the standing Army and Navy; the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau and all political instrumentalities designed to secure negro supremacy; simplification of the system, and discontinuance of inquisitorial modes of assessing and collecting internal revenue, so that the burden of taxation may be equalized and lessened; the credit of the Government and the currency made good; the repeal of all enactments for enrolling the State militia into national forces in time of peace; and a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

"7. Reform of abuses in the Administration, the expulsion of corrupt men from office, the abrogation of useless offices; the restoration of rightful authority to, and the independence of, the executive and judicial departments of the Government; the subordination of the military to the civil power, to the end that the usurpations of Congress and the despotism of the sword may cease.

"8. Equal rights and protection for naturalized and native-born citizens at home and abroad, the assertion of American nationality which shall command the respect of foreign Powers and furnish an example and encouragement to people struggling for national integrity, constitutional liberty, and individual rights, and the maintenance of the rights of naturalized citizens against the absolute doctrine of immutable allegiance, and the claims of foreign Powers to punish them for alleged crime committed beyond their jurisdiction."

Upon this platform, so admirable in tone and so patriotic and national in sentiment, the great national Democratic party enters the momentous contest of 1868.

Who can doubt the result provided we have a free and fair election. This we intend to have. Sir, all of these outrages upon the rights of the people, diabolical and tyrannous as they have been, all vanish into insignificance when compared with this other infamous and monstrous crime of robbing a free people of their life long and inalienable right of suffrage by fraud or force. Sir, you may take my lands, my home, my idols, and almost everything dear to freemen, but, in God's name, leave me the right of suffrage, the last hope of liberty. With this as our shield the country may yet be saved. God grant the people may be prepared to meet this great crisis. I firmly believe they will meet it as becomes freemen worthy to be the descendants of our patriotic and revolutionary sires.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Miller.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. F. MILLER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 14, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 3, 1867.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the treaty between the United States and Russia for the purchase of Alaska, was signed in the city of Washington on the 30th of March, 1867, by Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, on the part of the United States, and Mr. Stoeckl, the Russian minister, on the part of Russia, ratified by the Senate on the 28th of May, and ratifications were exchanged and proclamation made thereof on the 20th of June, 1867, and we are told that a formal transfer of the territory was effected at Sitka, October 18, 1867, this House not being consulted upon the subject. This treaty proposes to transfer to the United States for the consideration of $7,200,000 in gold, an area of country said to contain five hundred and seventy thousand square miles. It includes a margin of main land on the Pacific coast, in front of British America, thirty statute miles wide and three hundred miles long, extending from the forty-ninth parallel northward to Mount St. Elias. The coast line of the territory is said to be four thousand miles, and the peninsula of Alaska three hundred miles long, averaging thirty miles wide. The population of the said territory is estimated at seventy-five thousand, of which nine thousand are Russians, Creoles, Kodiaks, and Aleutes, and the remainder are Indians of different tribes.

Some of the gentlemen on this floor who have advocated the treaty have given a glowing description of the territory for agricultural purposes, lumbering, mining, &c. As for agriculture, it must be evident to every reflecting mind that a country of such high northern latitude would be of little account, and as to timber it is difficult to tell; if there should be any of value it is more than likely near the coast which seems to be mountainous; and as for minerals, it is principally conjecture. In fact, Mr. Chairman, little is known of that vast region of country, as it has not been traversed, in order to ascertain a description of it, even by the Russians who have so long held it, and that is no doubt owing to the danger and difficulty of exploring in such a severe climate and mountainous country. Though our Congressional Library is among the finest collections of books in the world nothing can be found in it giving anything like a satisfactory history of that territory, which goes to confirm the idea that it never has been fully traversed to ascertain the appearance of the country, and consequently as to the value of the territory little is known, and the description given on this floor can be but little more than conjecture. The only tangible advantage it might be to our Government would be in a commercial point of view by owning such an extensive coast.

I will consider, first, the power of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate to make the purchase, and, secondly, whether the concurrence of the House of Representatives is necessary to complete it, so as to make it binding. It is provided in the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States that the President shall have power, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur. By giving this clause of the Constitution a strict construction it would be very doubtful whether it gave authority to make a purchase of foreign territory, and were it still an open question it might require serious consideration; but this seems to have been settled by, I admit, a rather forced construction to permit the purchase of foreign territory, and that doctrine being acquiesced in by our country for more than half a century it ought to be considered as decided, and at this late day not to be questioned. Mr. Jefferson conceded the right to purchase foreign territory under a construction of the Constitution of the United States, but he puts it upon the ground of the necessity of the case; but, as I have already said, that right being so long acquiesced in must be deemed as settled.

Taking it for granted that after the purchase of Louisiana, Florida, and various other possessions, the authority will not be questioned, I proceed to consider for what a treaty may be set aside, and whether the concurrence of the House of Representatives is necessary to perfect it. A treaty is defined to be "a compact made with a view to the public welfare by the supreme power, either for perpetuity or for considerable time." (Vattel's Law of Nations, 192.) In the same book, page 193, it is laid down that—

"Since, in the formation of every treaty, the contracting parties must be vested with sufficient power for the purpose, a treaty pernicious to the State is null and not at all obligatory, as no conductor of a nation has the power to enter into engagements to do things that are capable of destroying the State for whose safety the government is intrusted to him."

And on page 195 it is laid down by the same author that—

"A treaty concluded for an unjust or dishonest purpose is absolutely null and void."

In the case of this treaty with Russia there has been no fraud shown, though the propriety of the alleged purchase may be doubted. Though the second section of second article of the Constitution seems to vest this authority in the President with the advice and consent of two thirds of the Senators present, yet the seventh section of first article of the Constitution of the United States declares that—

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

So that without an appropriation which must originate in the House of Representatives, it is utterly impossible to carry out a treaty where it requires the payment of money, hence the necessity of the concurrence of the popular branch of the Government to such treaties. Even in England, where the treaty-making power is lodged in the king (or queen) the assent of Parliament is necessary:

"It was always considered as discretionary with Parliament to grant money to carry treaties into effect or not, and to repeal or not repeal laws that interfere with them—Debates in Annals of Congress, Fourth Congress, first session, 1795 and 1796, page 470, on the treaty with Great Britain.

And in same book, page 471, it is stated that—

"Upon this principle, founded on almost immemorial practice in Great Britain, did the minister of that kingdom when introducing the late treaty with Prussia into Parliament, tell the House that they will have to consider the treaty and make provisions for carrying it into effect. On the same principle, when the debate took place on that instrument, it was moved to strike out the sum proposed to be voted, which would have defeated it, and afterward to strike out the appropriation clause, which would have rendered the bill a mere vote of credit, and would also have caused the treaty to fall to the ground, and on the same principle the king of Great Britain, when he mentioned the American treaty, proposed to lay it before them in proper season that they might judge of the propriety of enacting the necessary provisions to carry it into effect."

After a full discussion in the year 1796 upon the appropriation to carry into effect the Jay treaty, the following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present shall concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress, and it is the right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Mr. Randolph, in regard to the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, said:

"I hold in the highest veneration the principle established in the case of the British treaty, and the men by whom it was established, that in all matters requiring legislative aid it was the right and duty of this House to deliberate, and upon such deliberation to afford or refuse that aid, as in their judgment the public good might require."

Mr. Jefferson, the President of the United States, on the 17th of October, 1803, sent into Congress, which he had convened, a message in regard to the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana, recognizing the right of the House of Representatives to take action in the premises. In 1820, after the Spanish Government had neglected to comply with the stipulations of a treaty settling the boundary line between Louisiana and the Mexican territory, Mr. Clay, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, speaking upon resolutions introduced by himself, said:

"The Constitution of the United States has not defined the precise limits of that power, because from the nature of it they could not be prescribed. It appears to me, however, that no safe American statesman will assign to it a boundless scope. I presume, for example, that it will not be pretended that in a Government which is itself limited there is a functionary without limits. The first great bound to the power in question, I apprehend, is that no treaty can constitutionally transcend the very object and purposes of the Government itself. I think, also, wherever there are specified grants of power to Congress they limit and control or, I would rather say, modify the exercise of the general grant of the treaty-making power upon a principle which is familiar to every one." * * * "But if the concurrence of this House be not necessary in the cases asserted, if there be no restriction upon the power, I am considering it may draw to itself and absorb the whole of the powers of the Government. To contract alliances, to stipulate for raising troops to be employed in a common war about to be waged, to grant subsidies, even to introduce foreign troops within the bosom of the country, are not unfrequent instances of the exercise of this power; and if in all such cases the honor and faith of the nation are committed by the exclusive act of the President and Senate, the melancholy duty alone might be left to Congress of recording the ruin of the Republic."

Without taking up more time in citing extracts from debates in regard to treaties, suffice it to say that the House of Representatives has never surrendered to the treaty-making power any of the prerogatives confided to it by the Constitution. I will, however, cite one judicial case upon the subject, and that is the case of Foster vs. Wilson, (2 Peters,) in which Chief Justice Marshall said:

"Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land; it is consequently to be regarded in the courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision, but when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political not the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court."

This treaty in regard to the purchase of Alaska is not, as contended by some on this floor, the "law of the land," and the House of Representatives merely bound to appropriate money to carry out its stipulations; and in this view I am sustained by both legislative precedents and judicial decisions, and I may repeat what has already been said in this discussion, that even Mr. Seward, who negotiated this treaty with Russia, refused to vote for the appropriation to pay for territory acquired from Mexico under the Gadsden treaty, notwithstanding he was a member of the United States Senate when the treaty was ratified.

But the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BANKS] does not go so far as to deny the power of this House over such treaties. In his speech he says:

"We do not deny, as was denied in the early history of the Government, the right of the House to information upon this subject, nor the right to consider the treaty in all its aspects and relations, and to determine its action upon its own discretion and judgment. For myself, I hold the authority to make a treaty, conferred by the Constitution upon the President and the Senate of the United States, to be a limited power; that the House of Representatives, as a coordinate branch of the Government, has a clear and unquestionable constitutional right to consider the subject of a treaty both before and after it is concluded, or at any time when it shall be the interest of the country so to do, to ascertain for itself whether it be within the scope of the treaty-making power, whether it be in contravention of the established policy and interests of the Government, or whether it be on the contrary destructive, as a treaty may well be, of the principles of the Constitution, the rights of the people, or the fundamental interests of the Government. This I hold to be the privilege of the House of Representatives upon the subject."

My colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] in an argument delivered yesterday, says:

"Our Constitution has put the whole treaty-making power into the hands of the President and Senate. Neither branch of the Government has any right to interfere."

In this my learned friend is mistaken, as I have already shown. My colleague says further:

"There is but one way to evade its execution; that is by bad faith."

Now, Mr. Chairman, as it must be conceded by every one who has given the subject a careful examination, that this House has a perfect right to say whether this treaty or purchase shall be carried out, and the question now recurs, ought this House to pass the bill now under consideration, appropriating out of the Treasury $7,200,000 in gold, for a territory of which we know but little, and not contiguous to any that we own, but at least four hundred miles from it? I do not, however, put much stress upon the fact that the territory proposed to be purchased is not contiguous, as no one, I presume, would object to the acquisition of Cuba, if the same could be procured upon fair and honorable terms; nor am I opposed to the acquisition of foreign territory where it is evident that it would be of an advantage to our country, when it can be got upon reasonable terms, and can be paid for without oppressing the tax-payers.

Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of extending our domain, I can see no good reason for adopting at this time the treaty with Russia for the purchase of "Alaska," a country which, as I have already said, we know but little about, and judging from its location, doubtful if any of it will be susceptible of cultivation, or at least such as will induce persons to settle there under a homestead law; and as to minerals, we have little or no reliable information, so that the main value, so far as can be gathered from the speeches, are fisheries, which from the glowing descriptions are evidently very much exaggerated; and to afford this alleged source of wealth to be derived from fisheries, we will have the expense of governing that territory which will be no small sum annually, and that, too, a people who do not understand our language or are in any way acquainted with our form of government; and if the Indians should commit depredations we may have the expense of an Indian war in that severe climate, and we all know what an enormous sum a war with Indians costs the United States. Then, Mr. Chairman, taking into consideration our large national debt, and the ardent desire of our tax-payers for a reduction of taxation, I deem it inexpedient to approve of the treaty, and will therefore vote against the appropriation of $7,200,000 in gold to pay for the territory of Alaska; and in doing so I do not consider that I am in any way violating the provisions of the Constitution, or acting in bad faith with Russia, who I admit has been our friend during our late struggle, and I might add we have been hers; but notwithstanding the friendship there is no reason for us to vote away the people's money without an adequate consideration, and thus perform an act that may tend to increase our large national debt.

Territory of Wyoming.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. BURLEIGH,

OF DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 23, 1868,

On the bill (S. No. 357) to provide a territorial government for the Territory of Wyoming.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything upon the bill now before the House, to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming, and should not but for the extraordinary statements which have been made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories, [Mr. ASHLEY.] I feel that I should prove false to the interests of my constituents if I permitted those statements to pass unnoticed, or rather if I failed to lay the facts before the House as they actually exist after the misrepresentations which he has made. The territorial boundaries, as provided for in the bill, embrace an area of about one hundred and seven thousand square miles, or 68,480,000 acres, an extent of country almost three times as large as Ohio, that State having an area of only 39,684 square miles, or 25,578,960 acres. It is thirty-nine thousand square miles larger than the six New England States, and two thousand miles larger than New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. It contains fifteen thousand miles more territory than England, Scotland, and Wales, while it is but seven hundred and sixty-two miles smaller than the whole kingdom of Italy, and fourteen hundred and forty miles less than that of Prussia.

Dakota as at present organized is larger than the Austrian empire, and has an area of thirty thousand square miles more than France; but to bring the comparison nearer home, it is twenty thousand miles larger than all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware, and Maryland combined. Its mountains abound in the richest deposits of gold, silver, copper, and iron, while the whole surface of this vast Territory is underlaid with strata of bituminous coal of superior quality. As a stock and wool-growing country it possesses superior advantages. Most of its surface is covered with nutritious grasses, upon which cattle and sheep subsist the whole year. Its climate is more health-giving and delightful than can be found elsewhere on this continent. All along the line of our great national thoroughfare, which will soon connect the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific, towns and cities are springing up as if by magic power. It is along the line of this road, upon the fertile valleys of the rivers and streams, in the gorges of its majestic mountains, that tens of thousands of enterprising men are flocking from every State of the Union to seek homes in Wyoming. There they are now engaged in laying the foundation of what to-morrow will be a Territory; a few years hence a State of this Union.

These men have gone there from the older States, where they have been reared under the benign influence of civil governments regulated by civil law. They find themselves to-day in a new country where the protection of civil government cannot be successfully invoked, where the hand of justice does not reach. Sir, the thirty-five thousand loyal citizens of Wyoming are now pleading with this Congress to extend to them that measure of protection which the law alone can afford when administered by civil officers. I ask you, sir, and I ask this House, if there is anything unreasonable in the demand of these people? Is it not their right—more than this, is it not their birthright, as American citizens, to claim this, and is it not your duty as a part of the American Congress to guaranty it to them? What great crime have they committed, wherein is their offense, that you, the guardians of liberty, who are assembled here, should withhold from these people this great boon which they invoke at your hands. For what sin of commission or of omission are the citizens of this infant Territory to be spurned with contempt from this great citadel of justice and turned over to anarchy, violence, and murder for another year? Is it the expense of a territorial government that is to work this great wrong to a loyal people? It will not be materially increased by giving them a government. Pass the bill providing for biennial sessions of the territorial Legislatures, and double this amount will be saved. The cost of life, liberty, and happiness cannot be computed in dollars and cents.

This proposed Territory has a white population, according to the estimate of the best judges, of at least thirty-five thousand souls, and is so rapidly increasing that it is believed it will contain at least sixty thousand within the next twelve months.

For a distance of more than three hundred miles this Territory is crossed by the great Union Pacific railroad, and will in ninety days more have the line of this road extended from its eastern to its western boundaries, a distance of about four hundred and eighty miles.

This proposed Territory did not originally belong to Dakota, but was laid out at the time Montana was organized, and was then only attached to Dakota for temporary purposes—there being but few white people within its boundaries. Since that time the Pacific road has been constructed very far across its southern half, the precious metals have been discovered in paying quantities, while thousands of men are flocking there to find homes. From the capital of Dakota to the city of Cheyenne is a distance of seven hundred miles, and between eleven and twelve hundred miles to the western boundary of the Territory on the line of the road. The cost to the Federal Government, I am confident, will not be increased, while the benefits and blessings that will accrue to that portion of the Territory by giving it a separate organization can scarcely be estimated.

When before in the history of this country has a Territory with the population and extent of Wyoming been denied the benefits of a territorial organization? Never, sir! There is no precedent for it at all. The whole past action of Congress has been the reverse. Early in the session memorials and petitions were referred to the Committee on the Territories in this House, asking for a temporary government for this Territory. Week after week passed away, and there was no action. It soon became apparent that the chairman, for reasons best known to himself, would not act in the matter at all. Time and again when spoken to upon the subject he stated that mob law was the only form of law adapted to the government of this Territory, and the vigilance committee were the proper parties to execute it. Petitions and memorials of a similar character were then referred to the Senate Committee on Territories. After a thorough investigation, its chairman was unanimously instructed by his committee to report a bill. The Senate spent nearly a whole day in its examination, and then passed it without one dissenting vote. And here I desire to remark that several of those Senators have within the last year visited that Territory, and from personal observation became satisfied that a territorial government is absolutely needed there. That bill is now before this House. As the Delegate from Dakota, as the legal representative of these people, I ask that it be put upon its passage, and not referred to the committee, as requested by the chairman, where it will surely die. It has been examined by the members of the committee, and I know that while they would like to accommodate the chairman a majority of them are at heart in favor of passing it at the present time.

Eight long months have elapsed since this session commenced. During all of this time the honorable gentleman [Mr. ASHLEY] has known that we were laboring for this bill; and now, sir, he modestly comes here, at this late day, at the very close of the session, and asks that he be intrusted to his tender, fostering care, that he may strangle it. If the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories deemed it so important to the passage of this bill that his eagle eye should scrutinize it, and his great brain infuse the guarantees of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" into it, why did he not take it up in his committee and report it to this House?

After spending eight long months here, during which time he has not made an effort for our relief, but, on the contrary, has persistently refused to do so; while thirty-five thousand American citizens have been left in a state of anarchy, with no laws for their government except that which is administered by the mob, and no punishment save at the end of the halter, the gentleman comes in here and asks the House of Representatives of the American Congress to allow him to subjugate the whole population of this great territory to mob law and violence for another year, or until he can create a government for them which shall suit his views.

For one, sir, I do not believe that this House is prepared to sustain the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories, but that it will listen to and answer the prayers of these people and afford them speedy relief, which can only be done by passing this bill.

American Citizens—their Rights Abroad; their Duties at Home.

SPEECH OF HON. C. H. VAN WYCK, OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 17, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 768) to protect the rights of American citizens abroad.

Mr. VAN WYCK. On the 19th day of June last, I introduced the following resolution:

Whereas foreign nations should not be allowed to raise the question whether American citizenship was acquired by birth or adoption, the rights of citizenship being the same to all citizens; and whereas this Republic has pledged its faith to persons of all nations that residence, renunciation of former allegiance, and compliance with our laws makes them citizens here, and the honor of the nation is pledged that such promises be redeemed, no matter whence came the citizen or how powerful the nation that denies it; and whereas Great Britain has, in defiance of the law of nations—a portion of her own history and the results of the war of 1812—lately established in her courts the dogma "once a subject always a subject," and has in repeated instances refused to recognize the rights of American citizens by denying them the privilege of mixed juries, treating as subjects of her realm many of our citizens who had periled life in defense of this Government during the war of the rebellion, in some cases arresting and imprisoning for words spoken in this country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States immediately demand from any foreign country who may have imprisoned American citizens for words spoken in this country, acknowledgment as complete and ample as was made by this Government in the apology for the arrest of Messrs. Mason and Slidell; and if such apology be denied, he report the fact to Congress for its action. Also, that he demand reparation in all cases where American citizens have been treated as subjects of a foreign Power; and that to all such persons now imprisoned the rights herein claimed shall be granted; and that he report to this House what he has done, if anything, to secure such rights and redress the wrongs above set forth.

A question arising as to the treatment of American citizens by Great Britain, in order to ascertain the precise facts, on the 25th of June I submitted another resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any American citizens have been arrested, tried convicted, or imprisoned in Great Britain for words spoken and acts done in this country; whether any American citizens have been by Great Britain denied their rights as such, or otherwise treated as English subjects; whether American citizens have been denied the privilege of mixed juries; whether American citizens thus treated are now confined in English prisons; and what he has done to secure the release of any such persons, and why they have not been released.

Although the information must be on the files of the State Department, the questions easy of answer, no reply has as yet been made.

However, every reader of current history knows the present claims of Great Britain, of perpetual allegiance, that the accident of birth prevents a man from making any other the home and country of his choice. Practically with no other country in Europe is there necessity for solution of this grave question, for with no other is there a determination to ignore the American doctrine. We are boasting that treaties are about being made with the North German States recognizing the right of expatriation, but the North German States are not in the daily habit of insulting us by arresting and imprisoning our citizens.

Years ago Martin Kostza, a Hungarian, only having declared his intention to become an American citizen, while under the protection of the American flag, was seized by Austria. Captain Ingraham, though a thousand miles from home, with nothing of his country but the deck on which he trod, the flag above and the gallant men around him, demanded that the haughty tyrant release Kostza, and unless he was restored in the time limited the sound of American cannon should reëcho from the shores of the Mediterranean. Marcy, then Secretary of State, made haste to affirm the action of Captain Ingraham, and the great national heart, as if by electric impulse, sprang forth to greet him as a hero and doubly ratified the deed. Was it because Austria was weak we compelled her to her duty? Within a few months Great Britain has seized over three hundred American citizens, many of whom had defended the flag when in peril, placed them in dungeons, and at least a dozen are pining in a long series of penal servitude in defiance of our rights and contempt of our power as a nation. The Administration looks coldly on, and by its mere formal interference acquiesces in the conduct of Great Britain. Our citizens are subject to indignities such as no other nation, however powerless, would tolerate without at least a manly protest.

When the elder Adams was President, and Rufus King minister at St. James, and Irish patriots such as Emmet desired passports, he declined on the ground that America had enough such republicans. For just such acts the Federal party was hurled from power. Another Administration no better than the old Federal is now in place. The elder Adams is in his grave, but the family representative and the representative of federalism was minister at England, and he was ready to fawn on royalty and bend a supple knee to English dictation. He seemed to manifest no sympathy for the citizens of his country in prison. Many of those three hundred have been released, but upon conditions more humiliating than imprisonment, that they would never again return to that country. While fresh from our victory over the greatest rebellion the world ever witnessed, boasting our power against a world in arms, we concede an inability to protect our own citizens who have just come with the smell of battle on their garments and the scars of conflict on their persons. The representatives of this great Government stand trembling in presence of royalty, with hat in hand, instead of knocking at the door of her court and demanding, in the name of a free people, that the sanctity of the American citizen shall be respected. Is England so powerful she shall not do what Austria did? Are we so base that we demand from Austria what we beg from England? Before Great Britain would submit to such indignities her cannon would echo from mountain peak to mountain peak, until the circuit of the world would hear its roar.

However she may treat her own subjects, England stops not to count the cost when seeking redress for injuries inflicted by other nations upon them. Her citizens violate the laws of Theodore, King of Abyssinia, are imprisoned, and to relieve them an army marches into his dominions, slays the King, destroys his strongholds, and burns his capital, lest the Abyssinians may do some other injury to her subjects. England graciously assumes the labor of ruling that country for the future. For three hundred years the pretext of protecting her citizens has been more the reason for trampling on weaker nations to punish and subjugate them. So she did through tyranny in India, opium in China, and poison in New-Holland. When she plants her foot on a territory she never leaves it. She makes her depredations a right, her piracies a title. And during all the three hundred years the increase of her power, and the crimes she has committed against the nations, much of what she calls national glory has been upheld and sustained by her army, a large portion of which has been that very Irish population to whom this day she denies the right of expatriation.

In her treatment of other nations England has been a great freebooter, spurning the claims of others which she demanded with an iron will. We are to be restrained from exacting our rights lest the great rover may consider it a threat. England protects her citizens even in questionable rights, the world over, and makes it a pretext for extending her power and dominions, and shall we falter in demanding these rights which are the life of this Republic, without which we never could have existence or power among the nations?

We supposed this question had been settled with Great Britain in the war of 1812. Taking men, though born in England, from American vessels was no greater offense than immuring in English dungeons American citizens born in Ireland. But the gauntlet, though the bloody one of war, was thrown down by England; we took it up, and upon the land and upon the sea triumphed. Any other nation but England would have recognized the result of that war. Almost any Government but ours would have insisted that England respect those victories. Undoubtedly the British aristocracy do not like the Irish people, as they do not us. I mean the loyal portion of this Republic; for the rebels they did have some bowels of compassion. They loaned money and took cotton bonds as security; they built war vessels, manned them with English sailors, equipped them with English outfits, and let them forth to drive our commerce from the seas. They built fast steamers, loaded them with necessities, munitions of war, and then ran our blockade. She furnished a home in England for agents of the rebellion, and in Canada a rendezvous for the bandit crew to organize murder, arson, and scattering seeds of pestilence within our borders. When the Trent was boarded by Admiral Wilkes and the brace of traitors, Mason and Slidell, were arrested to answer the violated laws of their country, she made haste to demand restoration of their bodies and ample apology for the contempt we had shown to the offended sovereignty of Great Britain. Yet she must be allowed more zeal for American criminals than we can manifest for American citizens.

When we speak of England in this connection we refer to her ruling classes, to her aristocracy, to those who claim that they are booted and spurred and have a hereditary right to govern. We are to-day proud of English history, proud of the occasional triumphs of her steady yeomanry from the time when the Roman conqueror first planted the eagle of Italy on the rocks of Great Britain and returned to tell of a stony island in the ocean and of the rugged barbarians who dwelt in its glens and hunted on its cliffs. Many a time were English tyrants compelled to bow before the indignant Briton.

The pride of the Norman princes was humbled when upon King John the assembled barons imposed Magna Charta. The nation was avenged for the insolence and tyranny of the Tudors when a haughty line of monarchs went down in blood and the scepter was grasped by Cromwell. For centuries her struggling masses have been ridden by the few; now and then rising in the majesty of their power they have dashed their riders in the dust. Her middle classes sympathized with us in our contest, for in our success was foreshadowed their deliverance. For centuries the party of freedom, against great odds, have struggled long and patiently, gaining by slow degrees, rescuing little by little something of human rights from the grasp of the oppressor. Long has landed aristocracy held a vice-like grasp. The people were forbearing and forgiving. The corn laws, oppressing so many, were submitted to until to the sense of injustice the dread of starvation was added, and England's nobility were saved by consenting to blot out the infamous code.

Of the struggle of England, poor and oppressed for centuries, we are proud. All of her history and liberty that are valuable have been earned by them; each victory over wrong widened the plane of vision and gave hope of greater benefits. Liberalism obtained Magna Charta, and the centuries between her achieved liberties based on that victory, until the exertions of their immediate successions have culminated in the triumphs of the same class hated by Bright and Gladstone. To-day liberty-loving Englishmen, like Bright and Gladstone, acknowledge the hardship while they advocate the rights of Irishmen. We only arraign that portion of England which is in sympathy with oppression and wrong—that portion like unto Dickens, who had not one word of sympathy during our struggle, whose influence and assistance were against us; yet after rebellion had proved a failure, and Americans were frantic in an endeavor to dine and wine him, entertained them with the cheap declaration that next to their own flag they loved that of the United States, passing by entirely the love they had for the stars and bars. English aristocracy, which has always opposed us, to-day are denying the right of expatriation. Our national life depends on the recognition of this doctrine. We invite population from all nations of the earth, throw open our doors, give a farm of one hundred and sixty acres to whoever will come and occupy the land, expect them to be citizens in peace and soldiers in war; yet conceding we have not power to protect them in their chosen and cherished nationality, that if they desire to revisit the home and graves of their fathers, or business draws them thither, the dogma of perpetual allegiance enables the discarded Government to seize the person and compel allegiance by serving in their armies and navies.

Should war ensue between this country and Great Britain every naturalized citizen from England, Ireland, and Scotland who served in our armies would do so at the peril, if captured as a prisoner, of being tried and punished as a traitor against Great Britain. The proposition needs no argument. Its vital importance is evidenced by the mere statement, and the criminal neglect of a Government that would not demand it, as a Chicago platform says, "at all hazards," is open to the scorn of the world. When President Johnson was asked to secure the release of American citizens he asks for additional legislation. The Democratic party boasted the control of this Government for half a century, yet they failed to incorporate any such legislation on the statute-book. The law of nations gives authority necessary to save the nation's life and to defend its citizens. The Chicago platform pledges the party to the doctrine. The House of Representatives, by an almost unanimous vote, passed the bill providing for its enforcement, yet the Senate stand halting, fearing the English lion may roar and shake its bloody mane at us if we dare declare what rights belong to American citizenship and how far the world must respect them.

England, true to her many inconsistencies, has acknowledged the right of expatriation, which is a necessary consequence of emigration. Old Pharaoh undertook to deny to the Israelites the privilege to emigrate from Egypt, but he failed badly in the attempt. Greece and Rome acknowledged the right. Systems of naturalization prevailed with them. Cicero says:

"O glorious right! by which no man can be a citizen of more than one Commonwealth; by which no man can be compelled to leave it against his will, nor remain in it against his inclination."

All writers on natural law admit that expatriation is a natural right, and may be exercised when it is not forbidden by law. In England there was never such a law.

In the year 1803 a society in Scotland procured from Parliament an act the object of which was declared to be to prevent the hardships and abuses to which the Highland emigrant was exposed—an act regulating, not restraining, emigration. The real object of this law, according to Lord Selkirk, was to discourage emigration; still, here was a sanction of the British Parliament. At an early period it adopted the idea that it was lawful to throw off allegiance, as appears by statute of 14 and 15 Henry VIII, passed in the year 1522, entitled "What customs and impositions Englishmen sworn to foreign princes shall pay." It also allowed foreigners to be citizens by a law passed in 13 of George II:

"Foreign seamen, who shall have served two years in a ship-of-war, or ipso facto naturalized British subjects. Other classes are by different statutes naturalized to all intents and purposes as if they had been born British subjects."

In the time of Queen Anne a law was passed naturalizing all foreign Protestants. This law was repealed because it was found to be inexpedient, and not from any doubt of the power or right of the Government on the subject of naturalization. The statute of 13 George II is confirmed by 20 George III, chapter 20, section second:

"From and after the 1st day of January, 1736, mariners who shall have served for the space of two years on board of any of his majesty's ships-of-war, merchant or trading vessels, shall to all intents and purposes be deemed and taken to be natural-born subjects of his majesty's kingdom of Great Britain."

Thus the British doctrine of perpetual allegiance is contradicted by the British practice of naturalization. English decisions, like English statutes, have made shipwreck of their own dogma.

The theory of perpetual allegiance grew out of the feudal system when fealty was due from the subject; as tenant came from tenure and not from birth, lands were held on condition of military service; why retain one of the incidents of this system when the system itself has perished?

In discussing the question we of necessity antagonize England, and are defending necessarily the rights among others of naturalized citizens from Ireland. Yet they are our own rights. Without their acknowledgment our boast as a Republic is gone; and of what value can it be to say I, too, am an American citizen? It is a matter of regret that many of our people say Irishmen are against universal liberty and free suffrage. Their sympathies in this country are with the conservative party, which has the sympathy of their conservative oppressors at home. It is also to be regretted that there is too much truth for such sentiment. It seems almost incredible that any foreigner whose neck has been chafed by the yoke of oppression should aid a party who denies the right of liberty to all men. In other countries men are treated as slaves, denied the rights of citizenship, who are white. In England and Ireland the white man is kept a hewer of wood and drawer of water with the same indifference the black man was here. The argument is the same, that all men are not fit to be free and should not exercise the elective franchise. The man who has felt the yoke of bondage, and then wants to keep any portion of the human family, no matter the color of the skin, in slavery, does not desire himself to be free.

The meanness of caste in this country on account of color is no more wicked than the caste of nation, religion, or blood in Great Britain. Conservatives here talk of a white man's government; in Great Britain only a certain kind of white man's blood is entitled to consideration. One claim is equally as valid as the other. The only hope for the world is in liberty for all men, and until that thought is crystalized into warm, zealous action by all lovers of liberty there will be little of advancement for the oppressed. Restrict freedom to color, caste, and blood and you are turning back the hands on the dial of freedom. You are not ushering the world from the eclipse of ages of oppression, and for fear the unfortunate black man should be free you would turn upon the oppressed white man centuries more of burden. It may be natural for Irishmen to be Democrats. It is a tradition of his nation. He remembers the injustice of the administration of Adams, and that Jefferson, the father of Democracy, opened his heart and this nation as a refuge, that Jackson, himself an Irishman, was in sympathy with his fatherland. But Democracy then was not a conservative party. Jefferson and Jackson were radicals in those days; the vitality of Democratic principles was stifled when the old party came under the control as it did of the bidding of slave lords of the South, and was sought to be made the stalking horse to carry slavery throughout the Republic.

I ask an Irishman how much the conservative Democrat in this country would regard him were it not for the ballot he wields, and while he is chattering about the right of the negro let him ask himself the question, what would be his chance for protection in the country at the hands of conservatives without it? They would damn him with the same unction they do the negro. Have they forgotten even what they suffered a few years ago at the hands of mobs, who burned churches and convents, and also a few years later through Know-Nothing councils awakened national prejudices and religious hates. Yet to-day a large portion of the Irish are under the leadership of the Brookses and the class of men whose influence was to burn churches and "to put none but Americans on guard." The same men who awoke the spirit of violence to burn your churches aroused the hellish spirit of hate in the breasts of some of your people in an infamous riot in New York city to burn orphan asylums and murder women and children because they were black. Your churches were burned yet you were white. Was the crime any less than the other, when a mob destroyed asylums and murdered because the occupants were black?

You want Ireland free; it never will be until you love liberty for liberty's sake and believe in it enough that you desire men of all castes, religion, and colors shall enjoy it. Then the deliverance of your fatherland will be nigh. You are now only used as a tail to fly the Democratic kite; not so much to be censured as men like Brooks and Seymour, who seek to curtail liberty because they are opposed to its extension, whether to the children of Africa, Erin, or Crete. Strange that the Democratic party has infused its hatred into the Irish mind, for the Catholic church is the most liberal to the African of all religious denominations. The great O'Connell, whose heart was the home of Irish joys and Irish sorrows, the ocean of whose philanthropy knew no shore, despised slavery, and would not receive as a gift money from unrequited toil. With prophetic vision he said:

ful system, and then your nation will be fair as the sun, clear as the moon, and more terrible to the gray-headed aristocracy of Europe than an army with banners."

The Republican party believes that all nations should enjoy liberty, and I here protest that any feeling of antagonism should exist against Ireland, even though a large proportion of our Irish-born citizens should attempt to restrict it to the condition of color in this country. We believe that the Cretan, the Hungarian, the Irishman, the African, all should be free, all shades of color, all grades, shades of religious faith, all races of men, not by reason of physical development or mental endowment, but alone by the title of manhood which the Almighty stamped at the day of his creation of man in his image, when he placed a heart in his breast and a brain in his head. We intend to struggle for that full fruition and complete development. Yet, Irishmen in this country by opposition to universal liberty may delay the coming of that glorious time. Had the bulk of the Irish population here warmly sympathized with us in our late struggle, had they steadily refused to be made the tools of Seymour and the copperheads, do they not know that the regard they manifested for us and universal liberty would have been doubly repaid, and that when the time came for them to strike the shackles from Ireland's nationality a power from this country would have gone up with them which would have opened every prison door, and if England staked the chances of opposition would have trampled her throne in the dust and thrown it in the sea?

To every nation in Europe striving to be free we owe a debt of gratitude. It is a tribute they are paying to the spirit of American liberty, and gives promise of the time when the chill of death shall gather about the heart of despotism. A cold conservatism has long enough deadened our sympathies for the oppressed. Monarchs may combine for the protection of each, and to preserve the balance of power. How soon would a republic in Europe be torn as a gentle kid by the fierce wolves of arbitrary power, so that freedom should never have a foothold? Italy must be sundered and Poland dismembered so that crowns should rest more securely on the heads of tyrants. In the fierce struggle of 1848 this Republic was as powerless as though European monarchs had bound her hand and foot. The time must come when we will be allowed the same sympathy and support to freedom that absolute power yields to despotism. Did we do our duty to-day the gallant band of Cretans in their island fortress would not single-handed be engaged in a deadly struggle with the Turk.

As the arguments so the customs and laws of despots in all ages have been the same. The English code in Ireland was an outburst of religious hate and a hate of races; the substratum of all despotism is hate. Pharaoh's oppression, England's oppression, and the slaveholder's oppression was substantially the same. White men in England governed white men in Ireland with the same code that rebels, galvanized into State governments by Johnson, endeavored to impose on the freedmen, no suffrage, while in Ireland was three per cent. to vote, and even then commenced a long martyrdom and terrible agony like that under which the negro bends to-day in ten States, with the empty mockery of the ballot at the peril of life; not allowed to carry arms; no education of children; not allowed to leave residence after sunset in Ireland after the curfew; no intermarriage of Catholics with Protestants; killing of an Irishman by an Englishman no felony; denial of the right to sit on juries, for England held the courts and press, and gave its own coloring to what it called Ireland's complaints and what she called Ireland's outrages. The outside world only knew of Ireland through seven hundred of its dark and bloody years through English historians; so the world knew but little of the system of slavery except through the slaveholder's press. The African committed no crime whereby he was enslaved and is now sought to be disfranchised; the Irishmen committed no crime that for seven hundred years he has been deprived of his rights as a native, and subjected to all the indignities which cruelty could suggest.

It is natural English conservatives should oppose the enfranchisement of Ireland; it is natural conservative Democrats should oppose liberation and suffrage to the African, but it is unnatural that Irishmen should deny freedom and its benefits to any human being, no matter the color of his skin, the extent of his mental capacity, or the degradation from which he is raised. Slavery debased in ignorance the negro, and then pointed to that ignorance as a reason why he should not be elevated. England for centuries disrobed Ireland of its nationality, took away the land from its ancient owners, so that its peasantry had no claim to the cottage or the acre on which they lived, deprived them of the necessities of life, so they subsisted at one time on sea-weed and potatoes, and in miserable hovels; having stripped them of property, education, of everything that makes life happy, now point to their miserable condition as a reason they should be longer oppressed.

We have a right to sympathize with all nations struggling to be free. From all nations came those who planted the germ of a Republic amid the blasts of winter, the howlings of the wilderness, and the deadly whoop of the savage. From all nations were filled the serried ranks which carried the flowery standard through seven years of war. From then till now from all nations comes that continually recruited army which not less than the hosts that unfurled its standard at Bunker Hill and took the British colors down at Yorktown is entitled to be called the Army of Liberation, as the emigrant multitude, armed with implements of labor, smite the forest and the prairie from the morning until the evening, and plant in advance of the ages to come the starry banner of the nation against the frontier sky.

We do owe a debt of gratitude to Ireland for what she has contributed to the world's and our own history. She has given statesmen, orators, and poets, unrivaled in the earth; Sheridan, the finest of orators; Wellington, the great soldier. The sweetest poet of the language was Moore; the most vigorous writer was Swift; the greatest statesman was Burke. Commodore Perry, of our own Navy, whom the English could not bribe for £60,000 and a captaincy of an English frigate. The Irish have produced generals and marshals of France, Spain, Austria, Russia, and Sardinia; furnished magnates of the empire and grandees of Spain. They renewed the war against England under the banners of her enemies. Their valor was arrayed against her at Romillies, Almanza, and Lanfeldt. She encountered it in the service of Spain at Gibraltar, under Lally at Pondicherry, and it turned the day against the iron steadfastness of her infantry at Fontenoy. The Irish blood has given a ruler to Spain in the person of O'Donnell; a hero to France in McMahon.

After the revolution of 1688 William and Mary discouraged manufacturing in Ireland, and many came early to this country; men like the Clintons of New York, the Carrolls of Maryland. To Massachusetts came Berkely in 1729, who at his favorite retreat at Narragansett bay, wrote—

"Westward the course of empire takes its way,
The four first acts already past;
A fifth shall close the drama with the day,
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

They enlisted early in the war of the revolution. Patrick Henry was its most distinguished orator. In England headed by Burke, Barre and Sheridan, spoke and wrote in our defense. While in France McMahon, Dillon, Fermoy, and Conway were ready to and did volunteer. Richard Montgomery, John Sullivan, George Clinton and Anthony Wayne were among the first brigadiers in the patriot army, and through the war one third of the active chiefs were of Irish birth or descent.

Our Navy was started under command of an Irishman; and when the flag of the Union was agreed on Captain John Baring, a wonderful man, was the first to hoist it over the Lexington. John Dunlap, an Irishman, in 1771, printed the first daily paper in America. He was printer to the convention of 1774 and the First Congress, the first who printed the Declaration of Independence, which was first copied by Charles Thompson and first read to the people by Colonel John Nixon, and in 1815 first published with fac similes by John Burns, all Irishmen. Nine out of the fifty-six persons signing the Declaration, and six of the thirty-six delegates by whom the Constitution of 1787 was promulgated were of Irish origin. The first Governor of Pennsylvania after the war was a native of Dublin. Among Senators were two and among Representatives in Congress the same number of Irishmen. From that race were early advocates of internal improvements. Sullivan, of Massachusetts, projected the Middlesex canal. In 1784 Christopher Colles petitioned the Legislature of New York on the importance of uniting the western lakes to the Atlantic; also Robert Fulton; while the most distinguished mathematician on the continent was Robert Adrain. These were some of the studious men, stout-hearted wrestlers with formidable problems, patient bearers for truth-sake of ridicule and reproach, we most boast of and enjoy.

In the Navy, 1814, Blakely commanded the Wasp, which defeated the Reindeer. Thomas McDonough, with Stephen Decatur, distinguished himself in the attack on Tripoli in 1805, and in 1814, on Lake Champlain, with eighty-six guns, defeated the British fleet with ninety-five. Charles Stewart was the fifth commodore Ireland gave to America.

Thus these noble men helped to make this a refuge for their posterity from the oppression of England. And they did hope in the coming time from out this Republic would go forth an influence which, if it did not redress the wrongs of seven hundred years, would at least plant the sunburst in glory once more, and the harp, if not rung again in Tara's halls, might sound notes of freedom through the Celtic heart, and proclaim that Ireland was not only restored to her place among the nations, but that the mantle adorned her shoulders, and the casquet of freedom, not with parti-colored stars, but refulgent with universal liberty might appear in enduring light to strengthen the hearts and nerve the purpose of Europe's struggling millions. That day must come, how soon will be determined by the manner in which Irishmen discharge their duties in America.

Treaty with Osage Indians.

REMARKS OF HON. SIDNEY CLARKE, OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 25, 1868,

On presenting the protest against the treaty with the Great and Little Osage Indians, and a memorial in behalf of the common schools of Kansas.

MR. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to present to the House a series of resolutions protesting against the treaty with the Great and Little Osage Indians. The sentiments expressed in these resolutions meet with my cordial concurrence. The State Teachers' Association of Kansas is an organization representing the organized educational interests of my State; and, sir, these resolutions faithfully express the sentiments of the great body of the people. I move that the resolutions be inserted in the Globe, and also that they be printed.

I also present a statement of Rev. P. McVickar, State superintendent of public instruction, in the nature of a memorial, in behalf of the common schools of Kansas, which I desire to have printed in the same way:

An Appeal to the Congress of the United States in behalf of the Common Schools of Kansas.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
TOPEKA, KANSAS, July 3, 1868.

I learn that a number of treaties for Indian reservations lying within the bounds of Kansas are now in the hands of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

As representative of the educational department of the State government I earnestly request that in the consummation of said treaties the interests of our common schools may be so recognized as to secure, if possible, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections on said reservations for the support of common schools, in accordance with the plan of the act of admission.

I am aware that a wrong impression extensively prevails in reference to the amount of school lands in Kansas. Many are erroneously of the opinion that inasmuch as the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections were granted for school purposes, consequently the common school endowment of Kansas is twice as large as that granted to other States. But the facts in the case go to show that the endowment of the common schools of our State is limited.

The policy of the General Government in the extinguishment of Indian titles in Michigan, Wisconsin, and other States, gave the Indian tribes so removed the privilege of selecting extensive reservations beyond the Missouri river and in what now constitutes the State of Kansas. The result was that the organization of Kansas as a Territory included a very large amount of our soil thus preoccupied. These reservations, too, were selected by the keen insight of the red man in the most valuable sections of the State, and with primary reference to streams, timber, and other valuable resources. The extent of territory thus preoccupied within the bounds of the State may be seen by a glance at the early maps of Kansas. In the Topeka United States land office district, the register, Mr. Ira H. Smith, reports a deficit of school lands on account of Indian reservations, amounting to 159,269 acres. The whole deficit of school lands arising from this cause is over seven hundred thousand acres.

In the southern portion of Kansas a vast body of land, fifty miles north and south, extending from the east line nearly to the west line of the State; in other words, almost one fourth of the area of the entire State of Kansas is included in what is called the Cherokee neutral lands and Osage reservations. The amount of school lands embraced in the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections on the Osage reservation, the treaty for which is now pending, is four hundred and forty-four thousand four hundred and forty-four, or nearly half a million acres.

In behalf of the people of Kansas, I submit whether, in the extinguishing of Indian titles that policy is just to the State or to the Republic itself by which, including all the Indian reservations, more than a fourth of the area of Kansas, or an extent of territory larger than that of Massachusetts and Connecticut combined, is left without a single acre of school lands as an endowment for the education of the masses of the people.

Yours, very respectfully,

P. McVICKAR,
State Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of Kansas.

Resolutions passed by Kansas State Teachers' Association, Emporia, July 2, 1868.

Whereas a treaty has lately been negotiated between the Osage Indians and the Government of the United States by which the entire Osage reservation, amounting to eight million acres, is to be passed into the hands of a railroad corporation, without reserving the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections for common schools; and whereas such treaty is now before the Senate of the United States for ratification or rejection; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the State Teachers' Association of Kansas: 1. That the education of the people is of paramount importance to the enriching of any private corporation,

2. That the surrender of one sixth of our entire State to foreign capitalists is an insult to the State and an outrage upon the rights of her citizens.

3. That Kansas has a right to, and does demand, of her Senators and Representatives, as well as of all other Senators and Representatives who are proud of her history, or realize the value of her common schools, to use their best endeavors to defeat this treaty.

4. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives, and also to the press of Kansas.

Secretary.

REMARKS OF HON. B. F. BUTLER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 25, 1868,

In answer to Senator HENDERSON'S explanation on the subject of impeachment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, from what happened in this city last evening, it becomes necessary to make a personal explanation as well for the committee of managers of the impeachment as for myself. A delicate and thankless duty was by the order of the House imposed upon its committee to investigate into the alleged corruptions connected with the late impeachment trial. As the inquiry must almost necessarily involve members of a coordinate branch of Congress, your committee were careful in nothing to overstep the limits of that parliamentary propriety which is due to the Senate. Very early in their examination they found both oral and written evidence, which appeared to involve the Senator from Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. HENDERSON]. Anxious that the Senator should have the amplest opportunity of explaining these inculpatory facts testified to against him, your committee addressed a note in the most courteous form of language they could command, in which he was requested to come before them, and, by giving testimony of such facts as he might know, to instruct the committee in their investigation. This the Senator from Missouri refused to do, but, on the contrary, made grievous complaint to that body that your committee's note of invitation was an insult to the body to which he belonged, and a breach of its privileges. In that, however, the Senate differed from him.

It may be observed here that upon a like request of your committee, both Senators from Massachusetts and the senior Senator from Kansas, among the very eldest of the Senate, came before your committee without objection and made answer and explanation of everything asked them, as might well have been expected of upright men, conscious of their integrity.

Notwithstanding such refusal of the Senator from Missouri to aid your committee in their search for the truth of the charges of corruption in the determination of the trial of the President, your committee, as was their bounden duty, because of the respect they owed to the Senate, refrained in their report from expressing any judgment of their own upon the significant and pertinent facts testified to touching the judicial conscience of that Senator in the trial. Feeling the delicacy of their position your committee did not deem it their duty to adjudicate according to the evidence given them, but in scrupulous regard to the privileges of the Senate contented themselves with reciting with a judicial severity of accuracy the testimony sworn to before them, grieving continually that, without the explanations of the Senator from Missouri of which he of his own will had deprived the committee, the evidence seemed to bear so hardly and conclusively upon him, and the more so as the refusal of the Senator to aid the committee in their pursuit of the truth in connection with such cogent evidence, was liable to be taken as a confession of guilt, particularly in the strong contrast with the conduct in that regard of the admittedly innocent and honorable Senators before mentioned. Indeed, so tender were your committee of all that concerned the Senate, that, learning an investigation had been ordered by the Senate, this committee did not ask to have the evidence taken by them printed lest its publication might embarrass that inquiry.

Thus much I have deemed it my duty to state in justice to a committee of the House, of which I was one of the humblest members. I take leave to say that the report of your committee was assented to by all the members of the committee then in the city.

A most unusual occurrence has rendered it necessary I should do so and ask further indulgence of the House on my own behalf.

On the evening of the Lord's day, yesterday, at a certain debating assembly held in this city, the Senator from Missouri made a most virulent attack upon myself under guise of a personal explanation.

Of the want of parliamentary propriety on the occasion, the manner and matter of the written remarks of the Senator, so far as regards the Senate, I shall not allow myself to comment lest I shall trench upon the same rule of parliamentary propriety which the Senator violated.

If that assembly to which I alluded deemed the holy Sabbath well spent in listening to such an harangue it is not for any member of the House to complain. Is not that assembly the guardian of its own honor? Indeed, it may well be justified by them under the precept that when a man's sheep or his ass hath fallen into a pit it is lawful to lift it out on the Sabbath day.

I am credibly informed that the reason why this particular Lord's day was chosen for an attack on a member of this House by the Senator, as himself has said, was that "General BUTLER had gone home, so there would not be any reply."

The manly bravery of such a choice of opportunity is only equalled by the candor and justice of the performance. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on Saturday I notified you of my intention after eight months of service here to return home, and was only detained by accident.

Stripped of adjectives and personalities the gravamen of the Senator's complaints of the report of your committee seemed to be: first, that he is therein charged with having been "seen" by one Lacey and one Craig; second, that he had some communication with Edmund Cooper, late the President's Private Secretary, on the subject of the impeachment, from which unpleasant inferences may be drawn.

For these inferences which he denies the Senator blames the committee. Now, we have made no charges against him. We have only carefully detailed the evidence which came before us. That this tends to show (how conclusively every man must judge) that at midnight on the 12th of May the Senator from Missouri had told his delegation that "he would vote for conviction on the eleventh article or resign;" that "he thought Johnson ought to be convicted and removed, and would give his delegation an answer whether he would resign at twelve o'clock, noon, of the 13th." A witness testified that unless "his delegation got the Senator's resignation before twelve o'clock of that day they never would, as Craig had gone to see the Senator with carte-blanc to fix him. Craig swears he did go to see the Senator at that time, and Lacey started to go with him. In two hours after Cooper, the President's Private Secretary, wrote to Andrew Johnson, as follows:

May 13.
DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The HENDERSON matter all right. Lacey has been to see him with Craig. All right. So says Evans.

Truly,

COOPER.

The same day, soon after twelve o'clock, the Senator refused either to vote for conviction or resign; but gave as a reason, in substance, that if the President was acquitted he would give all the Cabinet offices to Republicans and forward the congressional plan of reconstruction. How well President Johnson has carried out the plan of the Senator we all know from his last veto messages. Now, it is not denied by the Senator that all this and much more, was sworn to before the committee; nay, it is not denied that each separate fact is true. Cooper does not deny he wrote the letter saying, "HENDERSON matter all right," but admits it. It is the inferences from these facts which seems so to enrage the Senator as to make him call hard names, but the Senator should remember that calling hard names hurts nobody; if it did, he who now addresses you would have been dead "long, long ago."

HO. OF REPS.

Arms to Southern States—Mr. Dockery.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

It is not my fault that people will so conclusively draw inferences so deadly to the Senator's peace of mind. It is not my fault that the Senator, by continually explaining his vote on impeachment (for the present is the fourth time in open and secret session he has done so) with such show of temper, will convince the country that his conscience accuses him. None of the Senators who voted guilty, as the Senator told the Missouri delegation he was convinced he ought to do and promised he would do the night before Craig had "seen" him or resign on that fatal morning, have felt called upon to explain their votes even once. When a fowler shoots at a blackbird or other winged vermin in a thicket he can always tell by the fluttering in the bushes whether the shot has told. The Senator flops. There is a curious piece of evidence put in by the Senator himself, as a part of his Sabbath day speech, that is conclusive to a just mind that the Senator is pleading specially to make show of a defense. He produces and has read a letter from himself to Cooper asking to be excupated by, among others, the following words:

"Please state also whether you ever had any conversation with me on the subject of impeachment?"

Of course, Cooper answers that the Senator never had any such "conversation." I have examined the original letter to Cooper from the Senator, and I find it was with the Senator's own hand first written, "whether you ever had any 'communication' with me on the subject of impeachment?" That was a little too strong for Cooper's conscience even, and before he answered it, apparently in Cooper's handwriting, "communication" was scratched out, and "conversation" inserted. The committee did not say there was any evidence of conversation between Cooper and the Senator, only of "communication." "Lacey has seen him with Craig" is the evidence. Cooper cannot deny he wrote this. So he scratched out "communication" and inserts "conversation," and then answers the letter, as he may do truthfully and save his confederates. I have here an examined fac-simile copy of the Senator's letter as altered to meet Cooper's conscience for the amusement and instruction of the House.

One good result, however, has come from the Senator's attack on the committee. In the course of it he has produced a letter from Mr. Evarts, in which I find a suggestive explanation of the phrase, in Cooper's letter to the President, "All right, so says Evarts," which did not before occur to me. It is this: that the words "all right" as used by Mr. Evarts in this connection, referred to the whole case of his client as being all right, an assertion which might be innocent enough, and not to the "HENDERSON matter" only.

This explanation seems a reasonable one, and I am glad it has been made, and I call attention to it in justice to Mr. Evarts.

Nor do I think it my fault that the Senator having told his delegation that a part of the consequences to flow from the President's acquittal was to be that the Senator was to control the Federal patronage in Missouri, now procures his father-in-law to be appointed to a high and for him very lucrative office, thereby showing that the President is carrying out his side of the bargain, and paying for the aid he got on his trial, as in the case of Perry Fuller,

A. T. Lacy, E. O. Perrin, Simeon M. Johnson, and many others to whom he has since given office, which is urged as a very strong fact against the Senator. The country will draw its own conclusions from such acts, and no amount of vituperation of the committee or any of its members will prevent it.

In this matter of the explanation, as well as in the matter of the office, the people will believe the Senator has put his Foot in it. For myself I have neither explanation or apology to make for anything I have done on the committee, and shall treat the Senator making this attack and all others like it as my Uncle Toby did the fly which he caught buzzing about his ears. Carrying it to the window, as he let it out of his hand, he pityingly said, "Go, poor devil; there is room enough in the world for both thee and me."

Arms to Southern States.

REMARKS OF HON. O. H. DOCKERY,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 25, 1868,

On the subject of the distributing of arms to the Governors of the various States.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I see no necessity at this time for the passage of this bill. In the present irritable condition of the public mind I fear the results therefrom would be attended with danger to the peace and order of southern society. Nor can I perceive any reason why this movement should be necessarily connected with the political issues of the country. In my opinion, politics, as such, has nothing whatever to do with the distribution of arms in the State of North Carolina. It is, as it should be, a mere matter in itself of right or wrong, expediency or in expediency, propriety or impropriety, of such distribution of arms, totally disconnected with and dis severed from any particular issues as yet presented by either party in its political organization.

Now, sir, it looks to me as if the Government was by this movement throwing down the "wager of battle" to the southern States, assuming thereby an attitude unwise, imprudent, distrustful, and menacing, which can be, during the exciting contest now pending, in the hands of unscrupulous demagogues and frenzied politicians, perverted to the disparagement of the Government and to the prejudice of the tranquillity and quiet of our common country. I am opposed, decidedly opposed, to any such seeming hostile attitude, and in my humble opinion it is the duty of Congress to manifest a spirit of leniency, indulgence, and kindness. It is true, sir, that we have among us some restless, turbulent, and discontented spirits, some of whom, bankrupt alike in character and fortune, with nothing to lose of either, but perhaps much to gain, openly and boldly avow revolutionary schemes of great danger, dangerous to the well-being of society and subversive, perhaps, of the elementary principles upon which our system of Government is based. Such men are ever dangerous, and such men have lived at all times and under all forms of government. Evil spirits, their machinations are devilish and their plots often treasonable. Mortified at the utter discomfiture which has befallen them in the overthrow of their favored projects of disunion, chafed at the loss of slavery—which they intended to plant firmly and not uproot fully—chagrined at the overthrow of their darling idol of secession, which has been completely routed "horse, foot, and dragons," and forced by the legitimate results thereof to be present and take a prominent part in the administration of the last rites of the burial ceremony, and lastly over all and above all other considerations, mortified by the loss of that prestige which was once theirs; the loss of offices, of the honors and emoluments resulting therefrom, all, all together conduce to the general disquiet and uneasiness depicted in their countenances and unmistakably discernable in their political contortions. Such men are overweening in their ambition, and desperate in their efforts to regain lost honor and offices. In their estimation it were better to "reign in hell than serve in heaven." They may attempt to reconstruct their political ideas, to resurrect that demon of ruin, secession, but must and will fail. For them, sir, I have no word of defense; in their behalf I have nothing to say by way of justification, or yet of extenuation even. If suspected of dangerous purposes let their actions be closely observed; if convicted of traitorous designs let the strong arm of the Government be put forth for its protection, and let punishment signal, and severe, be meted out to them.

But, sir, the masses of the people, the yeomanry of the land, are loyal and true, honest, hitherto unsuspecting, but now jealous of their rights, as they are mindful of their best interests. I can vouch for them; and in their behalf and on their account, I deprecate the passage of this bill. A native, and "to the manner born," I am of them and with them. I know, with them, something of the horrors of secession, something of the arts and trickery resorted to by which the late fratricidal strife was inaugurated by which the southern heart "was fired" and the rebellion "precipitated" on the country—something, by sad experience, of the wanton loss of property by illegal and unfeeling "impressment laws," something of the loss of liberty by unwise and cruel suspensions of that great bulwark of civil liberty, habeas corpus; something of incarcerations, bastiles, dungeons; something, too, of the practical workings of that hateful exotic, the conscription act, born upon foreign soil, and reared by designing men during that "reign of terror," which threatened the peace of the world, and inundated the continent of Europe with waves of human blood. Something yet still of the utter destitution, impoverishment, complete exhaustion of the southern people. Knowing all this fully, thoroughly, I repeat, sir, I can vouch for their obedience to the laws and respect for the constitutional authorities.

The people, Mr. Speaker, of North Carolina, are tired of war. "Their thoughts are turned on peace." Quietly, unobtrusively, yet energetically, they are disposed to look after their private interests, in an honest effort to repair their shattered fortunes, to educate their children, to make their families happy and life comfortable. Let them alone in the pursuit of their peaceful vocations. Introduce not into their midst elements of discord. Alarm them not with the "grim visage of war." Excite not their fears at this time by unwise, unnecessary, and unjustifiable legislation. Southern society is yet unsettled; the constituent elements thereof are not homogeneous; old grudges are yet alive; feelings of resentment are still unquenched; much bitterness in localities prevails, and a spark thrown wantonly into this pile of combustibles may possibly produce an explosion which will jar our country to its center. Let the seething caldron boil down before adding additional fuel to the flames. Let time with its soothing influences mollify and soften the rancor of political hatred. Let the patriot, statesman, philanthropist, and Christian each proceed in his respective sphere to infuse new life into these disorganized communities by the assurance to them of a perfect reconstruction of the recently alienated States on the basis of good will, fraternal concord, and perfect equality. "Let us have peace." Forbearance and conciliation will insure harmony when threats and menace will produce discord and further strife. Permanent peace, lasting tranquillity, and quiet is essential to the well-being, if not to the existence of southern society, securing alike to both races, not necessarily divided in interest, but equally interested in social order and good government, political and civil equality, leaving to each, respectively, the right in the vexed question of social equality to chose their own associates, as taste or inclination may direct—for legislation on such a matter would be unwise if practicable. On such a basis society will of itself settle down "in the good old ways of our fathers." Slavery no longer exists; its baneful influence no longer blights our land. Let us meet the issues resulting therefrom in an honest effort to solve these distracting questions with an "eye single" to the best interest of our whole country, North, South, East, and West. The South has rights now, though she rebelled. She is entitled to consideration to-day, though she has been overrun and conquered. If her people are sincerely attached to the Union let the Government protect her in all her political and constitutional privileges; if she is a component part of the Union let the Government insure her the benefit of all the guarantees justly hers in return for that allegiance exacted of her.

Mr. Speaker, I have been an untiring advocate of the reconstruction of the State of North Carolina—I have been more than anxious to "get home." Let our return to the ark of our political salvation be greeted with joy; let "full fellowship" be granted us, and in the future, "discarding punctilio and the maxims adapted to more manageable times," let each section vie with the other in the cultivation of a feeling intensely national, ardently loyal, thoroughly American. I see no necessity at this time for any change in the question of suffrage. Universal suffrage seems founded on expediency, on right, in keeping with the march of events, and is to me the only sensible solution of the surrounding difficulties. It accords with the cherished maxim of the great apostle of Democracy, that he who was required to "pay taxes and fight for his country was entitled to the elective franchise." Universal suffrage, however, in my opinion, should be accompanied with universal amnesty. Not until these great principles are both established will our Government be fully and safely reconstructed. In this matter there should be no half-way house; no political purgatory, out of which treason and crime are hatched, but on conviction, either suitable punishment or full pardon. Proscription for opinion's sake has always recoiled on the heads of its authors, and from the temperament of man ever must. In a political view it is not only unwise, but suicidal, engendering opposition and forming combinations formidable in numbers and vindictive in character.

Then, sir, with conciliation and kindness on the part of the Government toward her late erring children, with manhood suffrage in every State, with amnesty for past political offenses, the rehabilitation of our country will be completed, restoration perfected, security obtained, and happiness secured. In my State, sir, we long for this condition of things. Peace and quiet are necessary, in our crippled condition, to the development of our immense resources. We have a climate genial and soil fertile, producing all the cereals known to our country, from the rice of the sea-coast to the buckwheat of the mountains, from the cotton of the southern to the tobacco of the northern portion, interspersed with almost boundless forests of pine, yielding turpentine and naval stores in greatest profusion; inexhaustible mines of gold, silver, copper, and coal basins of national importance; the home of the grape, both Catawba and Scuppernon, of early maturity and perfection of growth, all of which await development under the steady arm and unbending will of man, in the construction of railroads and opening of rivers for cheap and speedy transportation.

Let the country become quiet, and there "will be life in the old land yet," and this can only be established by a strict adherence to the graphic and beautiful expression of the founder of the Republican party, who had safely conducted the ship of state through the surging billows of an angry sea for four long, anxious, and bloody years, standing firm and unmoved amid the threatened ruin of the temple of liberty. Yet, when the billows gave way, the winds subsided, the war ended, the strife was over, the brave, though erring Lee was surrendering his sword, the serried host were being "mustered out," the stars and bars were being lowered forever, and the stars and stripes, as if cognizant of events, beamed forth with newness of life, then it was the pure and gifted Lincoln in that moment of joyous exultation exclaimed in language impressively eloquent, "Our country is saved, our Union is preserved, now with malice toward none, but charity for all, let us make it endure for ages to come."

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. S. M. CULLOM,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 10, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia, of March 30, 1867.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the bill making an appropriation of $7,200,000 to pay for the Territory of Alaska. I shall give my reasons for so voting very briefly. The Constitution says that—"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties; provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

It also says:

"That all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

"That Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

"To establish a uniform rule of naturalization," &c.

By these provisions it is apparent that the treaty-making power of the Government under the Constitution is in the President and Senate; and that the power to raise revenue, regulate commerce, and make uniform rules of naturalization is vested in the Congress of the United States.

Congress cannot originate a treaty; nor can the President and Senate raise revenue nor regulate commerce.

But the question here is, is this House bound in good faith and under the Constitution to make this appropriation? The treaty made by the President and ratified by the Senate, provides for the payment of $7,200,000 to the Russian Government for the Alaska territory. Now, are we as the House of Representatives, bound by the Constitution and in honor to provide for its payment? If we are, then, we should do so at all hazards; if we are not, then it becomes a mere question of expediency, to be decided by our estimation of the value of the contract, if such it may be called. On determining the question it seems to me there is but one point in the case to settle. Is the treaty perfect and complete, or is it unfinished and inchoate and dependent upon the very question we are considering, namely, whether we shall make the appropriation?

I fully understand the fact that Congress can, by mere force of its own will, refuse to make the appropriation; but the question is can it do so consistent with the honor of the nation and its constitutional prerogatives? If the treaty is perfect and complete, so that the nation is bound and may be held responsible by the Russian Government in case of failure to make the appropriation and payment, then I should vote the appropriation. But it seems to me that it is not. The Russian Government knew that the power to raise revenue rested with Congress. There can be no pretense that that Government was ignorant of the provisions of our Constitution. It was well known that Congress would have to be invoked, and that that branch of the Government was free to act as its members might choose. It has been the settled doctrine of this country ever since 1794 that Congress has the right to deliberate and carry out or refuse to carry out a treaty as in their judgment might be for the public good, when such treaty contained stipulations which depended upon Congress for their execution. The resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Fourth Congress asserted that doctrine, and it has been adhered to ever since. I give the resolution:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that 'the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided that two thirds of the Senators present concur,' the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

This resolution is explicit and clear in its declaration that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any subject which by the Constitution is submitted to the power of Congress, in such cases Congress has the right to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if Congress has the right to deliberate and vote and pass whatever law may be necessary to carry out a treaty, where by its terms legislation is necessary, as in this case, an appropriation being necessary before the terms of the contract can be complied with in paying the money for the land, or to refuse to enact such legislation, is it not the inevitable conclusion to which you must come that such a treaty does not become the supreme law of the land until such legislation is had, and that it is a contract entered into between the parties, but not binding upon the Government because it remains in an inchoate condition? Of what consequence is the right to deliberate, if after all we are bound at last to come to but one conclusion, and that to do whatever may be necessary to carry out the treaty? The resolution of 1794 is nonsense if it simply means the House may consider and then vote as the President and Senate desire, or even if it means that we may deliberate and then violate a contract which is claimed to be the supreme law of the land, and to be such a contract as to give the other party the right to demand reparation for a violation. The doctrine of the Constitution and of the resolution of 1794 amounts to more than a declaration of arbitrary power; it amounts to a declaration, in my judgment, that a treaty which requires the action of Congress to carry it into effect does not become the supreme law of the land until such action by Congress is had.

Justice McLean, in my judgment, took the correct view of the matter in his opinion found in 5 McLean's Reports, page 314. He says that—

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land only when the treaty-making power can carry it into effect."

"A treaty which stipulates for the payment of money undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do; therefore the treaty is not the supreme law of the land."

"To give it the effect the action of Congress is necessary. And in this action the Representatives and Senators act on their own judgment and responsibility, and not on the judgment and responsibility of the treaty-making power."

"A foreign Government may be presumed to know the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress."

"No act of any part of the Government can be held to be a law which has not all the sanctions to make it law."

HO. OF REPS.

Irrigation and Forest Culture—Mr. Donnelly.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

So, according to this decision, the treaty with Russia for the purchase of Alaska is not the supreme law of the land because it undertakes to do that which it cannot do. Justice Marshall also entertained the same opinion. In 2 Peters, page 258, he says:

"Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial, department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court."

Then, if the treaty has not yet become the supreme law of the land, and if we have the right to deliberate and are left perfectly free to make the appropriation or refuse it, then the question recurs, What ought we do in reference to this appropriation? In other words, ought we to purchase, pay for, and own this territory now? I do not agree to the declaration that the territory is worthless. My opinion is that some day the territory will be valuable, but do we want it now, and are we in a condition now to begin a policy of acquisition? It seems to me not.

Our nation is in great financial embarrassment. We have just passed through a terrible war. We owe $2,500,000,000. Our debt is enormous in its proportions. The people are staggering under the mighty load.

We are here working and trying to devise ways and means to raise money to pay the interest upon the public debt and to meet the current expenses of the country, and at the same time lighten the burdens upon the people. Our public domain, without that territory, is almost boundless. Thousands and millions of acres of our lands yet remain unsurveyed and unoccupied. Are we in this condition of our affairs to deliberately inaugurate a new policy, and by it saddle upon the country an increased debt? Are we in this state of things, while the people are appealing to us for help and relief, to begin a series of purchases of land not contiguous to our own borders?

While day after day we sit here and refuse appropriations for rivers and harbors and other internal improvements which should be made in the very centers of trade and commerce in our country, are we to vote money to buy a region which yet has scarcely been explored, and to say the least is of doubtful value? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should not. I do not agree that our country is as large as it ever ought to be. I believe that we are destined to own and control the whole western continent from Baffin's bay to the Caribbean sea. But, sir, we need not be in a hurry. When the fruit is ripe it will fall into our hands. We need not be in haste, especially in times like these, to buy this or any other territory. But it is said that by securing this purchase England will not get it, and we shall be clearing the way to get the strip she owns between us and Alaska. I have no fears on that point. England is not blind. She knows too well that all that country in the course of time is bound to form a part of the American nation, and that when the time comes, when the American Government needs it, she will own it, either by purchase or conquest.

France has had a little schooling in the business of undertaking to set up an empire in Mexico, and her failure is notice to all other Governments that the land between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and north of the Caribbean sea is to be dedicated to free government and protected by the stars and stripes. It is only a question of time, and the time should be regulated by the needs of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to vote against this appropriation because I desire to see this House assert what seems to me to be clearly its constitutional right in refusing this appropriation, because we do not need the territory at present, because our people are already burdened with a public debt as much as they can bear, and finally, because we are sure of getting this territory whenever the growth of our young Republic may require it. Let us husband the resources of the nation, let us cut down expenses, let us make no new debts, let us favor the people in every possible manner consistent with the honor and integrity of the Government, until we come out of our pecuniary embarrassments, and then it will be time enough to treat for Alaska, St. Thomas's Island, Greenland, and Cuba. Until we do relieve the people of the burdens of taxation; until we get a little further along in the development of the resources of the country we already own; until we get able to improve the harbors and rivers in our midst, it seems to me we have no occasion to struggle to buy more land.

Irrigation and Forest Culture.

SPEECH OF HON. I. DONNELLY,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 15, 1868,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, the great lines of the Pacific railroads are penetrating into a region with characteristics very different from those of the country bordering on the two oceans. Emigration is entering that region; considerable communities have arisen within it; States are being born there.

The administration of this great domain is part of our public duty. We must consider its capabilities and the means for their development.

This region possesses marked and singular characteristics. It is one of great aridity. As a consequence it is treeless.

It was for a long time believed that all this interior country would be uninhabitable. It was set down on the old maps as "The Great American Desert."

If the institutions of a country leave the energy and industry of man free, the obstacles of nature disappear from his path; if those great forces are checked and hampered he suffers in the midst of abundance.

It has been found that the "Great American Desert" recedes as the foot of the American advances into the wilderness. It is now believed that almost every part of that wilderness will yet be rendered habitable by man.

It is proposed to overcome the aridity of the atmosphere and the consequent dryness of the soil by irrigation.

Already several bills are pending before this body for grants of land to California, Nevada, and other States for the construction of great works of irrigation. It is proposed in these bills to form large central canals leading from the sides of the mountains or from lakes or rivers, and of a size fit for navigation by small boats; and from these main canals smaller canals are to branch off, and again from these other canals still smaller, until at last the water will be distributed over the land in the furrows drawn by a plough. It is proposed that Congress shall give the company constructing such works one half of all the lands they irrigate. The lands so proposed to be given are at the present time utterly without value, having been, in some cases for many years in the market without finding a purchaser. One half of the lands, rendered by irrigation fertile and habitable, will be worth more to the Government and the people than the whole of the lands in their present barren and useless condition.

Nor is the practicability of such an undertaking at all a matter of doubt. Even in our own country irrigation has already been carried on upon a large scale. The success of the attempt in the case of the Mormon colony in Utah is well known to the world; and in California a large portion of the agriculture of the State is dependent upon irrigation for its success.

Nor must it be forgotten that in those regions esteemed "the cradle of the human race" the remains of ancient canals indicate that irrigation was one of the first instrumentalities employed by man to wring subsistence from the earth. In Persia, in Egypt, in India, and in China, irrigation far antedated recorded history. The desolation which has fallen upon Palestine resulted from the destruction of the reservoirs, canals, and terraces by which in the day of her prosperity irrigation was secured.

The dependence of Egypt upon irrigation is well understood. There is not a single spring in the whole land, and the rain-fall is but two inches in the year; and yet this land, surrounded by the arid atmosphere of the desert, was the granary of the ancient world, and is rapidly rising into importance in the markets of the present day. More unpromising than any portion of our great plains, it was made by the skill of man to sustain a population "as dense as any that ever existed in any part of the world."

In the south of Europe irrigation is extensively practiced. In Lombardy, upon each day in summer, an amount of water is distributed over the earth equal to the entire volume of the river Seine. In Sardinia and Savoy about six hundred thousand acres are cultivated by means of irrigation. In France two hundred and forty-seven thousand acres are irrigated. In Lombardy, Sardinia, and France more than three thousand square miles of land are watered by irrigation, while it is believed that the total amount of land irrigated in the Mediterranean basin is equal in area to the entire area of the Mediterranean sea.

The great Suez ship-canal is largely increasing the arable land of Egypt to the extent of hundreds of square miles.

These various facts all demonstrate that irrigation is not an experiment, but that it has been accomplished on a very large scale in other countries, and that millions of human beings depend upon it for their means of subsistence.

I hope to see these bills all passed. They should be properly guarded to prevent a monopoly of the water and to insure the rights of settlers.

Their success will lead to other experiments on a still larger scale until all the torrents of the mountains and all the rivers of the plains are brought under the control of man, and nearly all the level land of these great wastes are rendered fertile and populous and prosperous.

American enterprise will apply itself to these works as it has already applied itself to the construction of railroads. Capitalists will discover that at a comparatively small cost they can carry the waters of lakes and rivers for many miles and convert wastes of land which they receive as a gift into gardens of fertility of enormous value; while the Government will obtain in its reserved sections an equally large quantity of land for distribution among the people under the preëmption and homestead laws.

The highest statesmanship is that which calls out the capabilities and hidden resources of nature, and add to the happiness of man.

Another and a more surprising result will follow irrigation in our interior portions of the continent.

We find everywhere in the world that the density in the growth of the larger forms of vegetable life, the trees, is in exact proportion to the humidity of the atmosphere. Hence, as we recede from the oceans, the parents of the rain, we find the air becoming drier and the growth of the timber decreasing, until having passed the region of the prairies interspersed with groves and forests, we come at last to the great treeless plains where, in some places, even the grass refuses to grow.

The absence of forests is simply the result of the aridity of the atmosphere. But it is found that where the soil is humid trees will flourish notwithstanding the dryness of the atmosphere. This is shown in those portions of the West where a clay sub-soil exists; there the rain is held as in a basin, the earth remains moist, and groves and forests arise in the midst of prairies. If, then, an artificial humidity can be produced in the soil by means of irrigation, forests can be produced.

Let us consider this subject in its several branches:

I.—THE NECESSITY FOR TIMBER.

During the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, on the 18th day of May, 1866, I introduced in this House the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

"Resolved, That in view of the almost complete absence of woods and forests in the interior regions of the continent, and of their paramount importance in the settlement and occupancy of the country, the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire whether a system cannot be devised whereby the planting of woods and forests may be encouraged in regions destitute of timber by liberal donations of public lands in alternate sections to individuals or corporations, and the reservation of the adjoining sections by the Government at an increased price, as in the case of railroad grants; the lands so granted, or a proportional part thereof, to be planted with trees adapted to the climate and the needs of the community."

In answer to inquiries which grew out of this resolution, on the 28th June, 1866, Hon. J. M. Edmunds, then Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a communication to the Committee on the Public Lands, said:

"The subject of inquiry is one of vast importance to the future of this country. A large portion of the vast region between the Mississippi and Pacific is wholly destitute of timber, and this destitution is the great and principal hindrance to the rapid advance of settlements. These vast treeless plains and plateaus will be rendered habitable only by the presence of trees and groves, which will fertilize and moisten the soil, soften and modify the climate, and protect men and animals from the blighting effects of the dry and searching winds which now almost desolate that region."

A few facts will suggest the importance of trees and their products to civilized man. Bernard Palissy said:

"I cannot enough detest this thing, and I call it not an error, but a curse and a calamity to all France, for when forests shall be cut all arts shall cease, and they which practice them shall be driven out to eat grass with Nebuchadnezzar and the beasts of the field. I have divers times thought to set down in writing the arts which shall perish when there shall be no more wood; but when I had written down a great number I did perceive that there could be no end to my writing, and having diligently considered I found there was not any which could be followed without wood."

Palissy's apprehensions of the destruction of the woods of France were well founded. Mirabeau in 1750 estimated the forests of France at seventeen million hectares, while in 1860 it had fallen to eight millions, a loss of over one half in a century.

Rentzsch, in his work, "Der Wald," page 68, says:

"Spain, which by her position seemed destined for universal power, and once, in fact, possessed it, has lost her political rank, because under the unwise administration of the successors of Philip II. the empty exchequer could not furnish the means for building new fleets, for the destruction of the forests had raised the price of timber above the resources of the State."

War and peace, luxury and necessity, alike make their demand upon the forests.

During the first two years of our civil war twenty-eight thousand walnut trees were felled to supply a single European manufactory of gun-stocks for the American market.

Marsh in his work, "Man and Nature," says:

"The consumption of wood for Lucifer matches alone is enormous. I have heard of several instances where thousands of acres of fine forest have been purchased and felled, solely to supply timber for this purpose."

Rentzsch says, (page 68:)

"The demand for wood for children's toys is incredibly large. The reports from the town of Sonneberg alone amounted in 1853 to sixty thousand centner or three thousand tons weight."

Bigelow (Des Etats Unis en 1863, p. 439) estimates that in 1862 the American railroads required ninety-seven millions two hundred thousand ties. Says Marsh:

"Enlightened individuals in most European States, governments in others, have made very extensive plantations, and France has now set herself energetically to work to restore the woods in the southern provinces, and thereby to prevent the utter depopulation and waste with which that once fertile soil and delicious climate are threatened."

Says the same author:

"The planting of the mountains will diminish the frequency and violence of river inundations, prevent the formation of torrents, mitigate the extremes of atmospheric temperature, humidity, and precipitation, restore dried up springs, rivulets, and sources of irrigation, shelter the fields from chilling and parching winds, prevent the spread of miasmatic effluvia, and, finally, furnish an inexhaustible and self-renewing supply of a material indispensable to so many purposes of domestic comfort, to the successful exercise of every art of peace and every destructive energy of war."

The insects most injurious to rural industry do not multiply in or near the woods. The locust which ravages the East with its voracious armies is bred in vast open plains which admit the full heat of the sun to hasten the hatching of the eggs, gather no moisture to destroy them and harbor no birds to feed upon the larvæ. It is only since the felling of the forests of Asia Minor and Cyrene, that the locust has become so fearfully destructive in those countries; and the grasshopper, which now threatens to be almost as great a pest to the agriculture of North American soils, breeds in seriously injurious numbers only where a wide extent of surface is bare of woods.

My own State has on several occasions suffered from the inroads of great armies of these insects from the treeless plains west of us; while they have on a still larger scale repeatedly desolated Kansas and Texas. This evil results from the fact that the exact balance between animal and vegetable life is not preserved in consequence of the absence of forests.

To supply the extraordinary demand for Italian iron occasioned by the exclusion of English iron in the time of Napoleon I, the furnaces of the valley of Bergamo were stimulated to great activity.

"The ordinary production of charcoal not sufficing to feed the furnaces and the forges, the woods were felled, the copses cut before their time and the whole economy of the forest was deranged. At Piazzatorre there was such a devastation of the woods, and consequently such an increased severity of climate that maize no longer ripened. An association formed for the purpose, effected the restoration of the forest and maize flourishes again in the fields of Piazzatorre."—Report by G. Rosa, in Il Politecnico, December, 1861, p. 614.

Says Dressard:

"Under the reign of Augustus, the forests which protected the Cevennes were felled or destroyed by fire in mass. A vast country, before covered with impenetrable woods—powerful obstacles to the movement and even to the formation of hurricanes—was suddenly denuded, swept bare, stripped, and soon after a scourge, hitherto unknown, the mistral or northwest wind, struck terror over the land from Arignon to the Bouches du Rhone, thence to Marseilles, and then directed its ravages over the whole maritime frontier. The people thought this wind a curse sent by God. They raised altars to it, and offered sacrifices to appease its rage."

Says Marsh:

"Under the consulate of Napoleon, the clearings had exerted so injurious an effect upon the climate, that the cultivation of the olive had retreated several leagues, and since the winters of 1820 and 1836 this branch of rural industry has been abandoned in a great number of localities, where it was advantageously pursued before. The orange now flourishes only at a few sheltered points of the coast, and it is threatened even at Hyeres, where the clearing of the hills near the town has proved very prejudicial to this valuable tree."

The influence of forests has long been recognized.

"Det gode Strøg i Afrika,
Der intet voxer kan, da ei det regner.
Og, omvendt, ingen Regn kan fælde, da
Der intet voxer."

Sir John F. W. Herschel accounts for the extreme aridity of Spain by the destruction of the forests of that country, and on the other hand declares—

"That rain has become more frequent in Egypt since the more vigorous cultivation of the palm tree."

In Malta rain became so scarce after the cutting down of the forests that in 1841 not a drop of rain had fallen in three years.

Asbjörnson says:

"Palestine and many other parts of Asia and northern Africa, which in ancient times were the granaries of Europe," * * * "are now deserts, and it is the destruction of the forests which alone has produced this desolation."

With all these facts before us it can, I think, be safely asserted that any considerable increase of woods upon our extensive prairies would be followed by these results:

I. An interruption of the great winds which now sweep with unbroken force over those regions:

Says Bequerree:

"In the valley of the Rhone, a simple hedge two meters in height is a sufficient protection for a distance of twenty-two meters."

Says Marsh:

"If we supposed the trees of a wood to have a mean height of only twenty yards they often beneficially affect the temperature or the moisture of a belt of land two or three hundred yards in width, and thus, perhaps rescue valuable crops from destruction."

It is asserted in Le Alpi che cingono l'Italia that—

"In consequence of the felling of the woods on the Apennines the sirocco prevails greatly on the right bank of the Po, in the Parmesan territory, and in part of Lombardy; it injures the harvests and the vineyards and sometimes ruins the crops of the season. In Modena and Reggio where formerly straw roofs resisted the force of the winds, tiles are now hardly sufficient; in others where tiles answered for roofs, large slabs of stone are now ineffectual."

Those who have felt the sweep of the wind in Dakota Territory, Nebraska, Iowa, or Kansas, can appreciate the force of this description.

II. The production of flocks of insectivorous birds, which by destroying the larvæ of the grasshopper will put an end to that pest which now consigns vast regions to desolation.

III. A supply of wood for fuel and for building purposes, and for the thousand minor uses for which it is employed by civilized man.

Our Government has paid as high as $150 per cord for wood at its military posts on the great plains. A civilized people cannot like the savage use the dry manure of the buffalo for fuel, nor can any frontier population afford to consume for fuel an article almost as scarce and as valuable as gold.

I pass to the next branch of my subject:

II.—THE FORESTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

According to the census of the United States for 1860, which gives returns of the "sawed and planed lumber" alone—excluding altogether timber for framing and for mechanical purposes—the value of the former material prepared for market in the United States was, in 1850, $58,521,976. In 1860 it had nearly doubled in amount, being $95,912,286.

Says Marsh, a very high authority:

"I greatly doubt whether any one of the American States, except, perhaps, Oregon, has at this moment more woodland than it ought permanently to preserve, though no doubt a different distribution of the forests in all of them might be highly advantageous."

Judge Edmunds, late Commissioner of the General Land Office, in the report from which I have already quoted, says:

"Till within a short time the advancing column of population has been composed of those who have been forced to contend with the densely-timbered region east of the Mississippi, carrying with them habits and tastes unsuited to the vast treeless plain now presented to our frontier settlements."

Having first learned that they could not live with forests, they have now to learn that they cannot live and prosper without them. Already the forests of New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ohio have been so far depleted that those States resort to Michigan and Wisconsin for lumber and timbers for domestic use."

But how long will the forests of Michigan, northern Wisconsin, and Minnesota stand between the treble drain of the older eastern States, the great prairies, and the valley of the Mississippi? Long before Michigan, northern Wisconsin, or Minnesota, the only States which can now export timber in large quantities, shall contain a population one half as dense as Massachusetts, they will not only cease to export, but will find a scarcity for their own local purposes.

* The three last named States are believed to contain more available timber than all the territory between the Mississippi river and the mountains, and extending from the British possessions to the Gulf of Mexico.

Heretofore, as new sections of the country have been brought within the line of settlement, new sources of timber supply have been opened. Hereafter the advance of the settlements but increases the demand upon the already diminished and diminishing reserve.

It should be borne in mind that to this time our great forests have met the demands and destruction of a gradually rising population from three to thirty-three millions of people, while they were for nearly the whole time diving deeper into the recesses of the unbroken primal supply. We have now gone through and surrounded this great timber reserve, and we enter upon the margin of the great treeless waste with our original store three quarters consumed, the demand accelerated, and the consumers to rise rapidly from thirty-three to fifty millions within the last third of this century. A little common arithmetic will satisfy any thinking man of the consequences, and of the proportion which the demand and supply will bear to each other at the close as compared with the commencement of this century. Extend the time for another fifty years, with the added population, and it will be fortunate if our people get boards three inches wide, as in China at the present time. Is it not apparent that we should at once cease to destroy and commence to produce?"

Having, as I think, demonstrated the vast importance of the woods to the members of the human family, and especially to that most important part of the human family, the agriculturists, whose labor is the basis of all the wealth, industry, prosperity, and happiness of the world, I turn to the next branch of the question.

III.—CAN FORESTS BE CREATED BY THE LABOR OF MAN?

The experience of the past cannot fail to give to this question an emphatic and affirmative answer.

Forests have been created from the earliest times.

Ordericus Vitalis tells us that William the Conqueror destroyed sixty parishes and drove out their inhabitants, in order that he might turn their lands into a forest, to be reserved as a hunting ground to him and his posterity, and he punished with death the killing of a deer, wild boar, or even a hare therein.

His successor, William Rufus, according to the Histoire de Ducs de Normandie et des Rois d'Angleterre "was hunting one day in a new forest which he had caused to be made out of eighteen parishes that he had destroyed, when by mischance he was killed by an arrow from the bow of Sir Walter Tyrell."

In France great desolation and depopulation resulted from the encroachment of the royal forests over the cultivated country, and much of the violence and bitterness that marked the great revolution arose from the cruel game laws made to protect these forests and their inhabitants.

In Europe sybviculture, or the growth of artificial forests, has given birth to an entire literature, embracing many great and distinguished names. They divide the science into the tailis or copse treatment, and the futale or full-growth system. Great care is taken to mingle the various trees in the proportions found in the natural forests, to exclude domestic animals that browse upon and destroy the tender shoots, and to select such localities as are fitted for the growth of forests and which at the same time can best be spared from agriculture. There is no "primitive forest" in Europe, many of them are altogether of artificial growth, while the remainder have been greatly changed and affected by the labor of man.

In Scotland and in the South of France many square miles of forest have been created. In Egypt, Mahemet Ali planted more than twenty millions of olive and fig and cottonwood trees, &c.

In an interesting series of articles by Bände, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, there is this statement:

"A spectator placed on the famous bell-tower of the cathedral of Antwerp, saw, not long since, on the opposite side of the Schelde only a vast desert plain; now he sees a forest, the limits of which are confounded with the horizon. Let him enter within its shade. The supposed forest is but a system of regular rows of trees, the oldest of which is not forty years of age. These plantations have ameliorated the climate which had doomed to sterility the soil where they are planted. While the tempest is violently agitating their tops the air a little below is still, and sands far more barren than the plateau of La Hague have been transformed, under their protection, into fertile fields."

A still stronger proof is afforded in the following extract:

"While Britain retains her awful situation among the nations of Europe," says Isaac Disraeli, father of the present prime minister of England, "the 'Sylvia' of Evelyn will endure with her triumphant oaks. In the third edition of that work the heart of the patriot expands at its result; he tells Charles II. 'how many millions of timber trees, besides infinite others, have been propagated and planted at the instigation and by the sole direction of this work.' It was an author in his studious retreat who, casting a prophetic eye on the age we live in, secured the late victories of our naval sovereignty. Inquire at the admiralty how the fleets of Nelson have been constructed, and they can tell you that it was with the oaks which the genius of Evelyn planted."—Literary Character, p. 274.

Mr. Greeley, in the New York Tribune of the 4th of June, 1866, said:

"Africa has her Sahara; Asia her Arabian sands and vast Tartar 'Steppes' or lofty, naked table-lands behind the Himalayan range; but America probably exceeds either in the extent of her area rendered uninhabitable by civilized man because of their arid desolation.

"This need not be, and must not continue. 'The plains' are not all sterile. Their soil is full of alkaline substances which strongly conduce to fertility. Salt Lake City is built on a bench or 'swale' five thousand feet above sea-level and nearly inclosed by lofty mountains, and no tree had grown on this or any kindred tract within the human tradition till the Mormons settled there; and now, being irrigated, it is embowered in shade and fruit trees. It might more easily have been converted into a dense forest. And we judge that there is no spot on the continent between the Isthmus of Darien and the sixtieth degree of north latitude where living water can be procured which cannot be readily covered with trees. Where water cannot be had, the case is more difficult; yet the red cedar and the mountain pine grow on the dryest, most sterile mountains; while the redwood and perhaps the big trees of California may be equally independent of water.

"Fire is the chief enemy of forests and dry regions, and had doubtless been dealing with them as man is now dealing with the buffalo for centuries. We saw ample evidence that timber was formerly less scarce on the plains and in the great basin than it now is, while in all the prairie States where roads and settlements have limited the sweep of prairie fires, there is a steady increase of timber. We do not say (as many do) that Illinois has more timber growing to-day than she had fifty years ago; but we do say that her timber is far better distributed than in 1815, and thus better adapted to the needs and uses of mankind."

The manner in which fruit trees of different kinds and originating in different regions and climates have been transferred to this country and successfully cultivated to the number of many millions is the most complete answer to all doubters. The orchards of the United States, if collected in one locality, would cover hundreds of thousands of acres. If such results have been achieved with these most tender and precarious foreign trees, why could they not be attained with the hardy forest trees of our own country? If we can raise groves of the peach can we not raise forests of the oak or the maple?

There is an additional fact to sustain Mr. Greeley's statement, that trees and groves may be grown by the aid of irrigation even in the midst of the sage and cactus plains. The French Government has been boring artesian wells in the great African desert, and wherever the water bubbles to the surface an oasis springs up. Laboulaye, in his beautiful tale of the "Four-Leaved Clover," has given a charming account of the development of such a well in the desert with its palm trees and its warbling birds. But there is a vast region of our country now almost uninhabitable which could be rendered so by the presence of groves and forests, and where they could be made to grow without irrigation. I refer to the Territory of Dakota, to Nebraska, and to western Minnesota and Kansas and Texas; in short, to all the border land between the timbered country and the arid interior. In the greater part of this country the forest would be almost spon-aneous. Little would be needed but to protect the young growth from fire and domestic cattle; and where no spontaneous growth of brush appeared to plant groves in such localities as will be most favorable, along the banks of streams or lakes, or near moist and springy places.

I quote with pleasure the following extract from a late number of the Wisconsin Farmer:

"As an evidence of the facility with which timber may be produced, we have only to observe results in localities where the spontaneous growth has been preserved by provident farmers; and we have seen no better examples than are to be found in Grant county. There large tracts of grub land have been left to grow up where the timber had been cut off or nearly destroyed by fires, and these groves, of all sizes, from a few acres up to hundreds of acres which everywhere skirts the prairies, form one of the most delightful features of that region. These saplings are mostly oak and hickory, and cover the ground so thickly that at a little distance their tall, straight trunks seem to form an impenetrable wall of timber, and this new growth is already furnishing supplies of fuel and fencing.

"One gentleman in Potosi informed us that twenty years before he had a tract covered with heavy timber which he cut off clean and left to grow up to young timber, and that the young growth would cut twenty-five cords of wood to the acre. Indeed, it is thought by some that there is as much weight of timber in Grant county now as there was twenty years ago."

In my own State practical men are trying the experiment and with marked success, as the following letter will show:

ELGIN, April 29, 1867.

To the Editors of the Wabasha Herald:

As you have given, from time to time, some very good advice to the people of this county in regard to planting trees and seeds for timber, I send you as my experience in planting Maple seeds, the following: In May, 1866, I sent to William Closson & Son, Prairie Garden, Prairie City, Illinois, four dollars, for which they sent me by express one bushel of soft Maple seed. I prepared my ground as for corn, marking one way with single shovel plow, three feet and a half apart, dropped seeds two inches apart, covered two inches deep. The trees grow from six to thirty inches high last season, and are now looking very finely, having stood the winter well although not protected.

Seeds of the soft maple usually ripen and fall in May, and can be gathered wherever large maple trees can be found. There are many places in Illinois or Pennsylvania where they can be bought. One should be careful in planting to avoid places where the snow drifts on the plants. Keep clean, and transplant at one year old, and then cultivate well, and I have no doubt that in eight years the trees will be twenty feet high. Hoping that many of our farmers will plant out largely and profit thereby, is my wish. GEORGE BRYANT.

IV.—WHAT CAN BE DONE TO STIMULATE SYLVICULTURE?

Washington Irving said: "He that plants a tree labors for posterity."

The sentiment is a beautiful one, but the fact itself has been the great obstacle to tree-planting.

The present emperor of France in his wonderful development of the material interests of France has not lost sight of the great question of sybviculture. A project is now in execution to border with trees the principal railroad lines of the nation, so that while the wealth of the country and the beauty of the landscape will be improved the trains will run under one continuous and beautiful arbor of foliage. At the same time it is proposed to plant largely those trees upon which the silkworms feed, so as to add immensely to the facilities for the silk manufactures of France, from which hundreds of thousands of the French people derive their subsistence. How vastly does a slight exercise of human foresight add to the resources and the happiness of millions!

But without foresight nothing can be achieved. He must be something of a philosopher who plants an orchard from which he can expect no returns for six, eight, or ten years. He must possess still more of the higher qualities of the mind who will set out a grove from which he will derive no income for ten, fifteen, or twenty years. Yet he who plants an orchard can hope to add only to the gratifications of the palate; while he who helps to dot the landscape with groves of trees changes the face of nature, adds enormously to the comfort of mankind, and increases the area of the cultivable earth. He does that which few men are able to do; he leaves a permanent trace of his own existence upon the bosom of the earth, to stand in stately monumental beauty long after he has gone back to the dust.

I hope the time is not far distant when every intelligent farmer in the sparsely timbered regions of the West will set out his grove of five, ten, or twenty acres, as regularly as he sets out his orchard. It is our boast that we Americans are unlike every other race of the world, and that neither nature nor our institutions can suggest any difficulty which we are not able to overcome. Hence we have readily and instinctively revived the irrigation of Asia upon the shores of the great basin; and we have brought to the work of mining for the precious metals in the mountains of California and Montana a degree of energy, invention, and skill unparalleled in any other quarter of the globe.

Shall our great flood-tide of immigration pause at the border of the treeless region, or shall it press forward, asking nothing of nature but soil and climate, and carrying with it not only the railroad for transportation but the very forest for protection? If the people who settled the Atlantic States were willing to toil for a lifetime to cut out of the dense forest an "opening" for cultivation, shall not this new race of pioneers be willing to exact a tithe of the labor to create a patch of forest as important to them as the forest "opening" was to their ancestors?

We are at the threshold of the greatest period of emigration ever known in the history of the world.

The earliest immigrants to America were forced away from their homes by a sublime religious enthusiasm. They chose the wilderness as they would have chosen the block or the stake, through devotion to their religious convictions.

The great diffusion of information has loosened the ties which bind men to their homes. A less motive now suffices to induce emigration. They have learned that the only escape from the density of population and the social inequalities of their native countries is to be found in those new lands of the earth which are in process of colonization. Education is producing amid its other marvelous results an equalizing of the populations of the world; a general shifting and unrest of enormous masses of men seeking an increase of their material welfare. The peace of the Old World, the growth of the New, and the happiness of mankind will all be increased by this process, until the time will come when the excellence of the Government of any country will be accurately tested by the emigration from or the immigration to its borders.

In this view every foot of the surface of the earth which can be rendered habitable becomes of importance. It may be that the very heart of the great plains cannot be made fit for the home of man even by the aid of irrigation; but at least we can drive the line of uninhabitability far inward; we can advance the leafy banners of civilization far toward the center of the continent, and we can turn the bare and desolate wilderness into a great garden of beauty, filled with all the comforts and all the abundance of civilized life.

III. WHAT HAS BEEN DONE IN THE INTEREST OF FOREST CULTURE?

On the 23d March, 1867, the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin passed an act entitled "An act relating to the growth of forest trees," creating commissioners to ascertain and report to the next Legislature in reference to "the injurious effects upon the climate of destroying the forests of the State; the evil consequences to the present and future inhabitants; the duty of the State in regard to the matter; what experiments should be made to perfect our knowledge of the growth and proper management of forest trees; the best method of preventing the evil effects of their destruction; what substitutes for wood can be found in the State, and generally such facts as may be most useful to persons desirous of preserving or increasing the growth of forest and other trees in the State of Wisconsin."

That commission has now made its report in a volume of over one hundred pages, which cannot be too highly praised as an admirable compendium of facts and opinions upon the subjects referred to in the act.

The progress of man has been precisely commensurate with his power to subdue to his purposes the forces of nature. He found the whole of Europe a vast expanse of forests, resounding with the howls of wild beasts. He sheltered himself from their fury in the caves of the earth, or in villages built on piles in the shallow waters of the lakes. But as the immortal instincts of his intellect worked themselves out he drove back and exterminated the beasts and laid low the forests; and working through countless generations, he has transformed the formless wilderness into one continuous garden; and the villages in the lakes have grown into mighty cities, holding out their arms to all the lands and all the seas.

The world was made for man, and he is its master. He has transformed it; he has developed the wild grass of Italy into the wheat plant, and he has covered with it millions of acres on continents where nature never placed it; he has gathered into his garden the fruits of all lands; he has made of the hardest substances in nature implements with which to overcome nature. The fiercest elements bow to the majesty of his genius; the subtlest principle of the air carries his messages even under the bosom of the great deep, furrowed by the ceaseless movements of his innumerable vessels; the torrent turns his mill wheel; the winds are his servants; the stars are his chronometers; the sun becomes his portrait-painter; he measures the nebulae of the milky way; he weighs the planets; he analyzes the light of the meteors; he tells you the substances of which the burning comet is composed; he tunnels the mountains; he bridges the streams; he maps the celestial world, and he surveys the bottom of the great deep; and last, and mightiest triumph of all, he restrains the beast-like passions of men, and forms a nation held together by the coherent common sense of every member of society.

If the people of the West resolve upon it, they can in the next one hundred years cover with forests one third of the entire country between the prairies of Illinois and the sage bushes of the great plains; and who shall say what changes such a transformation would work upon the climate and productions of our entire country?

Which is the harder task, for savages working with stone hatchets and torches to subdue a primeval forest and tame the wild luxuriance of its soil, or for civilized, cultivated, educated men, with all the helps of science, to plant along the margins of artificial streams the seeds of forest trees, and permit willing nature to do the rest?

Wisconsin has done a great work in taking the initiative in this matter. I make one or two extracts from the report in question. It quotes the following from Mr. J. J. Thomas:

"Isaac Pullen, a well known nurseryman of Hightown, New Jersey, showed me last summer, 1864, several belts of evergreens which had sprung up from his nursery rows to a height of twenty-five or thirty feet in ten years, and he stated that within the shelter of these screens, his nursery trees as well as farm crops average fifty per cent. more than on bleak and exposed places. I have known an ordinary English thorn hedge, which had been allowed to run up twenty feet or more in height, to shelter and save from winter killing a crop of wheat as far as its influence extended, while beyond this the grain was nearly destroyed."

The report continues:

"If tree belts in New Jersey have been known to increase the production of the land fifty per cent., and if one half this increase could be realized in Wisconsin, the surplus farm products of the year 1866 would have netted the State the sum of $17,300,000. This sum would have been added to the wealth of the State with but very little additional expense. The estimated value of nine of the principal crops of 1866 is $69,500,000."

I regret I cannot here find space to quote the numerous interesting facts mentioned in this report as to the clearly-defined influence of the destruction of the forests of southern and eastern Wisconsin upon the crops and climate of those regions. The report should be in every farmer's hands. I cannot refrain, however, from quoting the following:

"Such has been the change in the flow of the Milwaukee river, even while the area from which it receives its supply is but partially cleared, that the proprietors of most of the mills and factories have found it necessary to resort to the use of steam, at a largely increased yearly cost to supply the deficiency of water power in dry seasons of the year. The Menomonee river, a small tributary of the Milwaukee, has been effected in the same way and to a still greater extent, because a large proportion of the water supplying area has been stripped of its forest trees. Several of the mills that formerly found sufficient power on this stream have been entirely abandoned, others are propelled a large share of the time by steam."

"What has happened to the Milwaukee river and to those smaller streams has happened to all the other water courses in the State, from whose banks the forests have been removed."

"In the State of Michigan it has been found that the winters have greatly increased in severity within the last forty years, and that this increased severity seems to move along even paced with the destruction of the forests. Thirty years ago the peach was one of the most abundant fruits of that State; at that time frost—injurious to corn at any time—from May to October, was a thing unknown. Now the peach is an uncertain crop, and frost often injures the corn."

I find in one of the newspapers of the day the following:

"A bill has been introduced into the California Legislature to encourage the planting of shade trees. It is strange that such legislation is necessary in that land of big trees, but it is a fact that the waste and destruction of timber by the settlers of California have bared the soil in many places to the sun and winds for miles, and changed the cool groves and pleasant shady spots to dusty plains, as innocent of trees as the Arabian desert. This is especially the case upon the public roads. 'With the most attractive rural scenery in the world,' says a San Francisco journal, 'we have the dreariest roads and the balddest country houses and villages of any State in the Union. For fifteen years a warfare has been made upon the trees growing upon the plains and along thoroughfares until few of them are now left.'"

"It was one of the barbarous customs of the early settlers to cut down the trees in the neighborhood of their houses and whitewash the stumps, as a cheap and easy method at once of clearing the land and 'marking' the road; and this wholesale destruction was carried on with such utter lack of caution and judgment, that whole regions are now nearly destitute of the protection and advantages given to the soil and to its cultivation by the presence of forest trees. The consequences are that the winds have full sweep and the sun and storms full play throughout those regions: their fruitfulness is impaired and the health and comfort of the residents materially diminished, to say nothing of the desolate and monotonous aspect of these long reaches of shadeless roads, bald fields, and staring houses."

Michigan has already taken action in this matter. In 1867 a committee of the House of Representatives of that State reported to that body on the subject of forest trees, and stated that last year the loss on all that part of the State lying south of the Michigan Central railroad was estimated at no less than three fourths of their entire wheat crop! From what inquiries they had been able to make the loss on the wheat crop alone of that State for the last four years is not less than $20,000,000. They fear that these vast losses are but "the beginning of sorrow," and "that the improvidence which laid open their fields to that scourge of God, the southwest wind, by the wholesale destruction of the forests, is now only beginning to reap its fruits, and that these losses can only be avoided by restoring, in part at least, the natural boundaries against the wind."

I make one more extract from this highly valuable document:

"Now, if we look over the State, we will see that in the southern, most populous, and least wooded portion of the State of Wisconsin the forests have been destroyed at such a rate that they do not yield a supply adequate for the wants of the present inhabitants; and the forests of the northern region, heretofore considered the inexhaustible storehouse of wood for the adjoining treeless districts, will soon be so reduced that the people must look elsewhere for their supplies unless a better policy in regard to them be speedily adopted."

If heavily-wooded Michigan and Wisconsin are already becoming alarmed at the decrease of their forests and the injurious effects which their destruction produces on the climate, what shall we say of Iowa, southern and southwestern Minnesota, Nebraska, Dakota, Kansas, and all the rest of the great treeless region which stretches to the Rocky mountains? Without trees nine tenths of this region must continue uninhabitable. Without water the cultivation of trees on the great plains will be difficult.

In this region it will be wise for Congress to adopt some such policy as that suggested in the beginning of these remarks. If grants of land have led to the building of railroads where means of transportation were a necessity, will not similar grants lead to the dissemination of water and the planting of forests where forests and water are even as necessary as railroads? It will cost less to irrigate a mile and plant and protect forests thereon than it will to construct a mile of railroad, and the latter will be even more remunerative than the former.

The Government might also very properly give grants of land to institutions of learning, such as colleges and universities, situate in the treeless States to enable them to experiment in the planting and growth of forests.

The homestead law should also be amended so that whenever the claim of the settler does not contain any timber, and is five miles distant from any considerable body of forest, he should be required to plant with trees at least ten acres of the one hundred and sixty acres taken by him, and to protect the same until the expiration of his five years of settlement. This might at first seem an onerous requirement, but the settler would soon see that he derived all the benefits of his own labor, while the grove thus planted would add largely to the value of his land. An extensive tract of country so dotted over with groves of ten acres each would be transformed, not only in appearance, but in its climatic conditions, while its productive power would be largely increased by the protection the growing crops would receive from the sweeping winds.

The Agricultural Department, instead of flooding the country with common garden seeds, which can be procured at any seed-shop, should collect large quantities of the best forest-tree seeds and send them with accompanying directions to those on the frontiers who might apply therefor. A very few thousand dollars thus expended annually would produce an incalculable amount of good, which would be felt for many succeeding generations.

Mainly, however, in such a work, we must rely upon the wisely directed efforts of individuals, and on a healthy public sentiment to sustain them and to direct local legislation. The diffusion of information will do good. The example of a few far-sighted citizens in each community will be followed by a horde of imitators. This process is already at work. It is credibly asserted that there is more timber to-day in Illinois and Iowa than there was thirty-five years ago, and for the reason that from the very first the people felt the necessity for trees; they could not afford to recklessly destroy them, and they have set themselves to work to plant and protect them.

In the treeless regions every spot of land which shows a tendency to grow to brush should be carefully protected from fire and cattle. Such a spot is nature's hint—the prophecy of a forest. Where experiments are made they should be made upon such lands or those of a kindred quality. The banks of lakes, streams, and marshes should be taken advantage of, for there the moisture in the earth will compensate in part for the dryness of the atmosphere, while even the atmosphere itself is modified by the proximity of any considerable body of water. The farmer should plant his groves on those sides of his land from which the prevailing winds blow, and in such form as will afford the greatest amount of protection to the growing crops. The subject of forest planting should be taken up by the agricultural journals and farmers' clubs of the West, and premiums be given to those who do most to develop the subject, either by essays or experiments.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. GREEN B. RAUM,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 24, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill to provide for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes—

Mr. RAUM said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The country will not be surprised to see that no measure supported by the majority on this floor for the reconstruction of the rebel States meets the approbation of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

The reason, sir, is obvious. They hold to the proposition that when the rebellion was suppressed by the valor of our soldiers the people of the rebel States were entitled to and resumed all the rights and privileges which they possessed before the war, while we hold that by treason and rebellion the loyal State governments were destroyed, and that the people of the rebel States abdicated the right of self-government, and could only be restored to their former rights in pursuance of laws enacted by Congress, and that governments in the South could be established only by the same authority.

These inconsistent theories necessarily cause an antagonism between the Republican majority and the Democratic minority in Congress.

The real question involved in the contest of parties is whether loyal men or disloyal men shall rule this country; whether the men who voted and fought to preserve and maintain liberty and union in the United States shall control the destinies of this great Republic, or whether the criminal men of the South who fought for slavery and disunion and their allies in the North shall rule the country. This is the issue, the true issue, and it is upon this issue that parties must go to battle in the present campaign.

At the close of the war, Congress not being in session, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, undertook without authority of law to establish civil governments in the rebel States. Forgetful of the fact that he owed his election to the office of Vice President to the votes of loyal men, he proceeded to rebuild the shattered fragments of State governments in the South upon disloyal foundations. But the Congress of the United States determined that loyalty should be the foundation upon which should rest civil governments in those States lately torn by rebellion.

And, sir, it was for the law-making power of the land to settle by acts of legislation the terms upon which rebels should be restored to political rights under the Constitution, and to settle the mode and manner that civil governments should be reestablished in the South.

Congress has undertaken to do this, and has passed laws for that purpose which have commended themselves to the people of this country as being founded in wisdom and justice. But, sir, the Democratic party has at all times and places, in season and out of season, opposed these measures upon the specious plea that Congress was establishing a military despotism at the South, and was trampling upon the rights of the southern people.

And now, sir, when we bring forward a bill which proposes to confer upon the constitutional conventions elected by the people, the powers necessary for the protection of life, liberty, and property, and require the military authorities to render all necessary aid to preserve peace and enforce the laws, the Democracy are again up in arms in opposition to the bill. Why they oppose this measure I am entirely unable to comprehend, unless upon the general principal of total depravity. If it is wrong for the military authorities to administer public affairs in Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia, it must certainly be right for the civil authorities to be invested with all civil power. According to Democratic doctrine, however, it is wrong for those States to be governed by either military or civil authority, from which I necessarily imply a wish upon their part to see anarchy, confusion, and bloodshed prevail in those States.

Mr. Speaker, the constitutional conventions of Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia are composed mainly of loyal and patriotic men, who understand the condition of public affairs in those States and the wants of the people, and, in my judgment, it will be eminently proper and safe to intrust the administration of civil government to them until the work of reconstruction is completed. I therefore urge upon the Republican members to vote in a body for the bill now under consideration. This measure, just and proper in itself, is, in my opinion, made necessary by the attitude of the President and the Democratic party in respect to all the reconstruction acts of Congress. Heretofore contenting himself with veto messages and hostile inaction the President now assumes an attitude of defiance, and boldly asserts that the governments established in seven States of this Union in pursuance of law, and which are now represented on this floor, are illegal governments, and consequently not to be recognized by the executive department of the United States, and that the provisional governments established by him are legal, and their acts should be recognized as valid.

What does this mean, Mr. Speaker? It means, sir, that if a revolutionary movement is inaugurated in the southern States, headed by the rebels who, under the lead of Andrew Johnson, set on foot provisional governments, that the President will not upon the application of the legal and existing governments, aid to enforce the laws by military power, but that he will use the whole military force of this country to aid the rebels in overthrowing the loyal governments established in those States by virtue of the reconstruction acts of Congress.

And, sir, he would be upheld in an act of this kind by the entire Democratic party, for, sir, they are committed to such a scheme by the platform of their party, and more particularly by their candidate for Vice President, who in advance of his nomination, and for the purpose of securing it, in his letter of the 30th of June used the following extraordinary and revolutionary language:

"If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals, by the accession of twenty spurious Senators, and fifty Representatives, will control both branches of Congress, and his Administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson."

"There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution."

Here, sir, is the old cry of defending the Constitution against encroachment. It was this cry at the South that carried the people into rebellion; it was this cry that drenched the land with blood, and now it is again invoked by the same party in the interests of the very same men who eight years ago threatened secession in the event their candidate was not elected President.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Rebellion was organized under Buchanan's administration. While he, a weak, vacillating old man, disclaiming the power to prevent secession, avowed himself for the Union, how much greater the danger now of insurrection and bloodshed with Andrew Johnson for President, who, denying the validity of the governments in the southern States, possesses the firmness of purpose, the maliciousness of intent and sympathetic devotion to the adherents of the "lost cause" to nerve him to enter upon the execution of any scheme of anarchy and bloodshed which might promise the restoration to power of the dethroned slave-oligarchy of the South and their subservient allies of the North. And, sir, I raise the note of warning to the country, impending, imminent danger hangs like a pall over the Republic; the enemies of liberty, union, and justice, in the name of the Constitution are making a final appeal to all the evil passions and prejudices of the people against the supremacy and enforcement of the laws enacted under and by virtue of the Constitution itself. But, sir, the men who, in the dark hour of the nation's peril, voted and fought in defense of its Constitution and its flag cannot be deceived by this gilded treason of those who were, and still are, the enemies of the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws.

Funding the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. MARSHALL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 21, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt—

Mr. MARSHALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret that I have not had time to mature and thoroughly digest the views I desired to present on this important question, and to present clearly all the facts and figures which I deem important for its proper understanding and elucidation. The importance of the question cannot well be exaggerated. It involves at the same time the honor, character, and good faith of our Government and the happiness and well-being of our people. Its discussion brings prominently to view the issue made up on financial questions by the two great parties struggling to gain control of our Government by the verdict of the people in November.

POSITION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY ON THE DEBT QUESTION.

On the one hand the Democratic party regard the public debt not as a "public blessing," but as a public curse, weighing like an incubus upon the energies of the people, eating up their substance, and demoralizing and destructive in all its influences upon society. They propose to get rid of it just as soon as possible consistent with the rights and interests of the people and the honor and good faith of our Government. They insist that the bondholder shall not be a peculiarly privileged class, but shall be subject to taxation, and shall receive for obligations due him the lawful money of the United States, just precisely as any other citizen, excepting always those cases where the Government has agreed by its contract, or by law, to pay him in coin. They will pay the interest on the five-twenty bonds in coin, because their Government, in its contract, has agreed that it shall be so paid; they will pay both principal and interest of the ten-forty bonds in coin for the same reason; but they will pay the principal of the five-twenty bonds with the legal-tender currency of the United States, and thereby stop forever the ruinous coin interest—we are paying thereon, because it was that currency, greatly depreciated below its present value, that we received for the bonds when the loan was made, and more especially because by the contract the public creditor has neither a legal nor equitable claim to be paid in any other way. This, I think, is unquestionable, and this I shall endeavor hereafter to demonstrate. We do not propose, as is contemplated by this most suicidal—I am almost tempted to say, most infamous—act, without any consideration or claim of justice whatever, to increase this debt one third, or, in other words, vote the bondholders a bonus of nearly six hundred millions in gold; and then, by an inexorable and irreparable decree, fasten this accumulated debt upon our country for a period of forty years, with interest in gold, to be paid semi-annually, during all that time. I cannot see the justice or propriety of thus increasing and perpetuating the burdens of a patriotic people, already nearly driven to despair by the public demands upon their scanty means and the unhappy financial condition of their country.

POSITION OF THE RADICAL PARTY ON THE PUBLIC DEBT.

On the other hand, as already indicated, the Radical party now and for the last eight years unfortunately having absolute control of the Federal and nearly every State government, after having, by their extravagance and unparalleled corruptions, doubled the indebtedness of the country, are making herculean efforts to perpetuate their power and increase their ill-gotten gains. They have placed in the van, as their standard-bearer, a speechless sphinx, enveloped in a cloud of tobacco smoke, who professing no principles or political convictions himself promises most obsequiously to obey the behests of his party. And you now propose by this bill to convert a debt approaching two thousand million dollars, now payable in legal-tender notes, into bonds running forty years, payable in gold, exempt from all taxation, and the interest during all that time payable year by year in gold, to be coined from the sweat and toil and groans of an impoverished people.

You have arrayed yourselves on the side of the bondholders and the capitalists against the interest and rights of the tax-payers, and to give plausibility to your position raise the wolf howl of repudiation against the people who demand equal and exact justice for all, and indulge in stale platitudes about public faith and maintaining the public credit, when it is by your own extravagance and corruption that the public credit has been imperiled.

RADICAL PLATFORM ON FINANCIAL QUESTIONS.

There is an attempt in the platform adopted at Chicago to sugar-coat the purposes of your party by the use of popular and ad captandum phrases, and thus to make them acceptable to the tax-ridden portion of your followers. I will read from the platform all that is said upon the financial issues:

"Third. We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime, and national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter, but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

"Fourth. It is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit.

"Fifth. The national debt, contracted as it has been for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period for redemption, and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can possibly be done.

"Sixth. That the best policy to diminish our burden of debt is to so improve our credit that capitalists will seek to loan us money at lower rates of interest than we now pay, and must continue to pay, so long as repudiation, partial or total, open or covert, is threatened or suspected."

It is of course understood by all that this "covert repudiation" so boldly denounced refers to the proposition of the Democratic party to pay the five-twenty bonds, constituting the principal part of our indebtedness, in our present "greenback" currency. And according to this platform the national debt is not only to be paid all in gold, principal and interest, but the principal must not be paid now at all, but must "be extended over a fair period for redemption," and this fair period, according to the bill before us, is forty years, during which we will have no right to pay the principal, but must continue to coin our toil and sweat and muscles into gold semi-annually to pay the interest, until we all now on the stage of action go down to our graves.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM ON FINANCIAL QUESTIONS.

In contrast with this bondholders' platform I turn with pride and pleasure to the bold, clear, ringing, patriotic enunciations of the Democratic platform upon the same questions, adopted in New York at our recent national convention. I will read them, that all Radicals may blush at and all Democrats glory in the contrast presented by the two platforms:

"Third. Payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable; all moneys drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment, and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

"Fourth. Equal taxation of every species of property according to its real value, including Government bonds and other public securities.

"Fifth. One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the office-holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder.

"Sixth. Economy in the administration of the Government; the reduction of the standing Army and Navy; the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau and all political instrumentalities designed to secure negro supremacy; simplification of the system and discontinuance of inquisitorial modes of assessing and collecting internal revenue, so that the burden of taxation may be equalized and lessened; the credit of the Government and the currency made good; the repeal of all enactments for enrolling the State militia into national forces in time of peace; and a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

"Seventh. Reform of abuses in the administration, the expulsion of corrupt men from office, the abolition of useless offices; the restoration of rightful authority to, and independence of, the executive and judicial departments of the Government; the subordination of military to civil power, to the end that the usurpations of Congress and the despotism of the sword may cease."

There is no equivocation, no disguise. We propose to place the bondholders, the capitalists, the wealthy classes upon an equality as to taxation and otherwise with the laborer, the farmer, and the artisan. We will not admit his claim that merely because he is a bondholder, without any contract to that effect, he has a right to be paid in gold, while the pensioner, the soldier, and the producer must be paid in a depreciated currency. Where he has no contract for coin we will pay him in the lawful currency of the United States, just as every other debt of our country is payable; and by economy in the administration of the Government, reduction of the Army and Navy, abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau, making the lazy vagabond negroes that are now being fed and clothed at public expense go to work, and thus become producers instead of consumers, and by the reform of a thousand similar abuses that have crept into the public administration, we will have a large sum the very first year to be applied to the payment of the principal of our indebtedness, thus not only liquidating the principal, but getting rid of the interest thereon forever. Thus each year, the interest being less than the preceding year, the amount to be applied to the payment of the principal will be greater; and getting started in the right direction our enormous public debt will dwindle before the sturdy blows of a wise and economical Administration as the iceberg disappears beneath the rays of a tropical sun. It can be demonstrated that it is perfectly feasible.

ible to pay off the entire debt without increase of taxation or inflation of the currency within twelve or fourteen years at the furthest. What a happy deliverance that would be, and how proudly we would stand forth in the presence of the world when emancipated, redeemed, and disenthralled from our slavery to the bondholders and capitalists of Europe, and which thralldom you now propose deliberately to perpetuate.

Why should this be done? Why should our entire public indebtedness be now converted into gold-bearing, non-taxable bonds, the payment of the principal of which is to be postponed for thirty or forty years? I wish to be perfectly decorous, and to use no unparliamentary language. But this seems to me, Mr. Speaker, like a bold attempt to mortgage our country, the present generation with their children, to capitalists and to the wealthy lordlings of Europe. I can never give my assent to any such scheme, and I now protest against it, and denounce it as most unjust, unholy, and ruinous to the best interests of our country.

If there was a necessity for postponing the payment of any part of the debt for thirty or forty years a judicious and feasible plan for reducing the interest would be worthy of commendation. But when, by a judicious and proper administration of our affairs, we can pay off the principal, and thus get rid of the entire interest forever, it would be most suicidal to execute this new mortgage upon the resources of our country.

FUNDING BILL GIVES A BONUS OF SIX HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS TO THE BONDHOLDERS.

I have said that you by this bill propose to give the capitalists and bondholders a bonus of near six hundred millions without any consideration whatever. Let me be more specific. On the 1st day of June last, being the last official statement we have had of the public indebtedness, the five-twenty bond debt amounted to $1,494,755,600, and the debt bearing currency interest, most of which is being rapidly converted into five-twenties, was $203,117,540, making in the aggregate $1,697,873,140, all of which under existing laws is legally and equitably payable in greenbacks. Let us for the sake of simplicity in the calculation estimate the discount on legal tenders as against coin at only thirty per cent. The above sum would at that rate represent a gold indebtedness of $1,188,511,198, and could be paid off with that sum in coin. But you now propose to issue new bonds, free from all taxation, running forty years, with interest semi-annually, principal and interest in gold, for the full amount of $1,697,873,140, thus adding to our indebtedness at one fell swoop $509,361,942 in gold; equal to $662,170,524 in currency. I have placed the present discount on our currency too low, and consequently the nation's loss by this scheme is underestimated. But this sum, as I have stated it, which you propose to do worse than give away, or cast into the sea, for you fasten it with interest in gold upon us for forty years, amounts to nearly four times as much as the entire expenditures of the Government on land and sea from the adoption of the Constitution to the close of the last British war. And this is your pet financial measure which you have kept back to the closing days of the session, and which you expect, like charity, will cover a multitude of your past sins against the people.

"COVERT REPUDIATION."

But, says the loyal Chicago platform, "this is open or at least covert repudiation." The claim and the attempt to pay these loyal bondholders "who saved the life of the nation" is infamous, and will make us bow our heads in shame and disgrace before the nations of the earth. True, these bondholders paid the Government for the bonds when they got them in currency only worth from forty to fifty cents on the dollar, and they have been receiving six per cent. thereon in gold ever since; true, greenbacks are good enough money for the soldier, the laborer, the farmer, the merchant, and the pensioner, but to offer anything less than gold to these loyal bondholders is "covert repudiation," and "will brand us with infamy throughout all time." And this wolf howl is raised from one end of the land to the other to intimidate the people to submit to this outrageous robbery, and induce them to yield tamely to the avaricious demands of the money lords.

"Show me," says the polite, elegant, and "loyal" Vice President, BEN. WADE, "a man who favors paying the bonds in greenbacks, and I will show you a penitentiary bird." "The claim of the bondholders to be paid in gold," says the "loyal" president of the convention that nominated Grant, amid boisterous cheers, "is as sacred as the graves of our soldiers," and this sentiment is echoed through the "loyal" press from one end of the land to the other.

"THE DEBT A 'SACRED' ONE."

And whys this debt more sacred in its character, and to be paid in gold, when all others are paid in the lawful money of the United States? Government called for the services of a million soldiers and promised them so many dollars in monthly pay and bounties therefor. It has promised to pay the maimed soldier and the widows and orphans of those who died in battle pensions in dollars. It makes its contracts daily for thousands and millions of dollars for supplies for the Army and Navy and other branches of the public service. These are all sacred obligations, and yet who thinks of receiving their pay in anything but the legal-tender lawful money of the United States? This is good enough money for every other class of creditor, public and private, but to pay it, or propose to pay it, to the "loyal" bondholder is "covert repudiation," forsooth. Why is it so? "Oh, the contract, or at least the understanding at the time the bonds were sold, was that they should be paid in gold." I deny both these propositions, and as much will be said on this question during the canvass, and great efforts will be made to mislead the people, I propose now to submit the proofs.

REPUDIATION BY THE RADICALS.

I might, however, before going into the main question, here add that the very men who, in the interest of the bondholders, are so eager in their cry of repudiation, have themselves in numberless instances been guilty of not mere "covert" but open and barefaced repudiation. For instance, the first great loan made by our Government after it found itself involved in war—the seven-thirty three years' loan of July, 1861—$139,999,750 in amount, was taken in gold, (the Government receiving gold on every dollar thereof,) and was paid by the Government at maturity in greenbacks and bonds at a lower rate of interest, with principal payable in greenbacks. Over six hundred thousand dollars of this loan were paid in that currency. Those who took this loan and paid their gold into the Treasury were legitimate business men, who from patriotic motives came forward in that hour of gloom and despondency to the support of the Government, and gave their means freely and willingly for its maintenance. But they had not formed a "loyal" ring, and we heard no outcry against this repudiation of the obligations of the Government to them.

And at the passage of the legal-tender act of February, 1862, there were many millions of private debts throughout the United States which, when contracted, were payable in coin, but for which the creditors were compelled to receive greenbacks at a great discount. Here was wholesale repudiation, both public and private, by the party who are now so eager to "maintain the honor of the country." But my business now is with the five-twenty bonds, constituting the principal portion of our present indebtedness, and for which you now propose to issue bonds payable in gold, non-taxable, and running forty years. I propose to prove beyond all question that

THE HOLDERS OF THE FIVE-TWENTY BONDS HAVE NEITHER A LEGAL NOR EQUITABLE CLAIM TO PAYMENT IN ANYTHING BUT GREENBACKS.

On the 25th of February, 1862, Congress, to provide means to carry on the war, passed a law, the first section of which provided for $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, the language of which, as to their purpose and character, is as follows:

"And such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever."

Except what?

"except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

Language could not well be more clear and explicit. This new money thus authorized is by express terms to be "receivable in payment" "for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest on bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin." And it should be noted and remembered that it is only by virtue of this exception that the interest on the bonds authorized by this law can be paid in coin.

The second section of this act authorizes the issuance of $500,000,000 of bonds, registered or coupon, payable at the option of the United States in five years, and in twenty years at all events, and bearing six per cent. interest, payable semi-annually. This is the act authorizing the issuance of the famous five-twenty bonds. There is not a word here said as to the money in which these bonds shall be paid, and were it not for the exception contained in the previous section authorizing the issue of this new lawful money the interest as well as the principal of the bonds would most clearly be payable in the legal-tender Treasury notes. And that there might be no misapprehension or misunderstanding on the subject, the Government published broadcast to the whole world that these notes were receivable for "all debts except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." Every man in the United States, indeed, throughout the world, who received or handled one of these "greenbacks" found printed in clear, legible characters on the back thereof:

"This note is a legal tender for all debts, public or private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

If the law itself had not been sufficient notice to all the world, here was an additional notice more extensively published and circulated than any that has heretofore been given to mankind. And it was, in fact, this very money that was loaned to the Government with this notice on the back of each note when the five-twenty bonds were sold. And it is demonstrable that the creditors when the loan was made, and the bondholders into whose hands these bonds have passed, have all understood at all times that the principal of the bonds were payable in the legal-tender notes.

On this subject I find an argument cogent and explicit, made in December last by a "loyal" member of this House, [Mr. BROOMALL,] who I am sorry to find now favors the payment of these very bonds in gold, and will, I suppose, in obedience to the behests of his party, support this bill of iniquity now before us for consideration. I will give here his argument on the subject, which I defy even the learned gentleman himself now to answer:

"It makes no difference in the legal rights of these parties that this new kind of money was adopted before they loaned to the Government, and was the very kind of money which they did loan to the Government; but it takes from them all cause of complaint upon the score of fairness. If we had borrowed when gold was the only lawful money, and had afterward created a different species of less value to pay in, we might have been accused of foul dealing, though in doing so we would only have followed the repeated example of Governments older than ours, and of much greater pretensions.

"Can the creditor complain that he had no notice of the new money when the very act that authorized the loan created the new money? Can he complain that he had no notice when he loaned the new money, every note of which told him in language which he could not mistake that he must take all his pay in it except the interest? He hoped the new money would soon be as good as coin, but he knew that it might not be. In taking the bond he took that risk, and, as I will show, he took the bond at a rate which fully paid him for the risk. If the Government owes the money in gold it should pay it in gold; if it owes it in currency it should pay it in currency. It is just as bad faith to pay the money of the people to those who are not entitled to it as to refuse to pay it to those who are. We administer this money as trustees, and bad faith toward the cestui que trust is worse, if different at all, than bad faith toward a stranger. Now, I admit the agents of the Government who negotiated the loan promised the lenders that the principal should be paid in gold. I admit that the chief one of them, Mr. Jay Cooke, in a letter which was published at the time, even went so far as to say that Congress had already made provision for the payment of the principal in gold. It is not pretended that these agents had legal power to vary the contract, but it is said that Congress, the only body authorized to bind the Government in the premises, acquiesced in the declaration of these agents by silence. Truly a novel mode of binding the Government to pay money. Hardly even an ingenious invention in the way of legislation. But was Congress silent? It had already spoken in the enactment that authorized the loan. It is constantly speaking in that enactment, published as it is to the world and made legal and binding and continuing notice to everybody. More than that; Congress circulated far and wide on the back of every legal-tender note issued its notice that the principal of these bonds was to be paid in currency, and its caution to everybody not to believe the false promises of these agents.

"Now, I would very much regret to believe that the holders of these bonds took them under a misapprehension that the Government had bound itself to pay the principal in gold. But did they do so? Were they deceived, or rather did they not know that these agents were hired to sell the bonds for a commission upon the amount sold?

"What I propose to show is, that the original holders of the loan took it at as one the principal of which was to be paid in currency, and that the loan has since that time passed from hand to hand in the markets of the country and abroad, and is at this time passing as one the principal of which is to be paid in currency.

"The bonds which are now maturing at the option of the Government were issued pursuant to the act of February 25, 1862. They were made payable in five years, though not demandable until the expiration of twenty. This was the act which created the new money, the legal-tender notes, called currency to distinguish them from coin, though with no great propriety. The loan, amounting to $514,789,500, was all taken in currency and at par. I do not remember at what date after the passage of the act the negotiation began, probably about July 1, 1862. Up to June 30, 1863, $168,880,250 had been negotiated. An additional amount of $341,900,250 was negotiated during the year ending June 30, 1864, and the remaining $4,000,000 during the following thirteen months.

"Now, during the year ending June 30, 1863, the average price of gold was $137 83, and as the interest was payable in coin the average rate of interest at which the loan was taken during that year was $8 27 per $100. This was the rate which the lenders had a right to expect, but the rate actually received for that year was still more. The average price of gold in the November and May following, when the interest was payable, was $163 75; so that the rate actually received for that year was $9 82 per $100. And all this, too, was over and above all taxation except the small pittance of income tax, amounting to but thirty cents per $100 of loan.

"The average price of gold during the year ending June 30, 1864, the year in which nearly all the remainder of the loan was taken, was $153 08. The rate of interest, therefore, which the parties had a right to expect was $9 48; and the rate actually received, governed by the average price of gold in November and May of that year, was $9 73.

"If the advocates of this claim of the five-twenty bondholders are to be believed, here was a contract under which the Government borrowed $100 at an average rate of $9 03 per annum, with a promise to pay $151 33 at the maturity of the bond if the currency system should continue the same, and with no possibility of loss if it should not.

"Now, sir, bear in mind that during all this time there was the usual amount of borrowing and loaning going on in the community at six per cent. for permanent loans, payable both interest and principal, in currency; loans which were subject to United States, State, and municipal taxation to more than six times the amount of income taxation on the public bonds.

"Were the people afraid to trust the Government? Why, it could purchase in the markets on time on the same terms with individuals. All its promises to pay in currency passed even on more favorable terms than the average similar ones of individuals.

Its gold certificates, which were promises to pay gold, always passed for about the price of gold. More than all this, the public faith in the Government fulfilling its promises to the letter was tested and proved by placing the seven-thirty notes in the market side by side with these bonds. The notes bore a less rate of interest than the bonds. They were awfully payable, principal and interest, in currency. Yet they were taken at par and with great avidity. Yet they were convertible into the bonds. True; and this might make them as good as the bonds, but no better. Yet they were taken in preference to the bonds, and difficulty was experienced in inducing the holders to part with them for the bonds.

"Upon this branch of the argument, therefore, we have the facts that the original holders paid for the bonds in currency; they took them at a price which could only be justified upon the hypothesis that the principal was to be paid in currency; they had before them the acts of Congress which expressly told them that the principal was to be paid in currency; they took them at the same rate and side by side with the obligations of the Government known to be payable in currency and bearing a less rate of interest, and finally the gold certificates of the Government always sold in the same market for the price of gold. If, after all this, anybody will say that these original holders believed the Government to be bound to pay the principal in gold at maturity he will exhibit less faith in the intelligence of the bondholders than I have."

And it is as clear as any proposition can be that the bondholders have always understood the law and the obligation of the Government just as I contend it to be, and that they so understand it now. Look at the intelligence flashed across the Atlantic giving us daily information of the market value of our five-twenty bonds in Europe. The English three per cent. bonds are quoted at nearly par, while our six per cent. bonds, on which we pay the interest regularly in gold, is quoted at about seventy per cent.—or thirty per cent. discount. We have never failed for an instant to pay the interest faithfully and punctually. The ability and good faith of our Government are doubted nowhere. Six per cent. is a large interest in Europe, and yet our six per cent. bonds are and have been all the time at about thirty per cent. discount. This can only be accounted for on the ground that the bondholders do now, and have all the time, known that we have at any time after five years from the date of the bond a perfect and unquestionable right to pay the principal of these bonds in currency, worth about seventy cents to the dollar, and thereby stop the interest thereon forever. And they never would have thought of being paid in any other way if it had not been for the wolf cry of the astute and excessively loyal politicians of the Radical party. They have now very willingly formed a "ring" with the bondholders' candidate and the bondholders' party, and would very gladly divide with them this six hundred millions which it is proposed by this most bold and atrocious robbery of any age to filch from the already overburdened and overtaxed people of our country.

CAN WE PAY THE DEBT IN GREENBACKS WITHOUT RUINOUS INFLATION?

"But," says my loyal friend, "how do you propose to pay our debt in greenbacks? We have now in circulation only $356,000,000 in legal-tender notes. How can you pay a debt of $2,500,000,000 with that? If you put the paper-mills to work and grind out $2,000,000,000 more in legal tenders, and thus pay the debt at once, you will flood the country with a depreciated and irredeemable currency, and bring disaster and ruin to every branch of business in the country."

Now, those who talk in this way either do not know what they are talking about, or they are trying willfully to deceive the people. When it is asked how we will pay our debt with greenbacks without a further or ruinous issue thereof, I might with greater propriety ask my "loyal" friend how he expects to pay that debt with gold. There is, in fact, no gold in circulation among us as money. It is known to all intelligent observers that there is not in the United States to-day exceeding two hundred million of gold, including the one hundred millions or thereabouts in the Federal Treasury. Our gold coin has become a mere commodity instead of being used as a circulating medium. There is no demand for it among ourselves save for imports, neither is it hoarded here. But the demand from abroad is in excess of our supply. Indeed, if we possessed all the gold that has been coined in the United States from the foundation of our Government it would fall far short of paying our national debt. Ours has been the principal gold-producing country, and yet the gold coinage of the United States from 1792 to 1866 amounts to only $845,536,591, not enough if we now had the whole of it to pay one third of the audited and ascertained public debt. But ours is and has ever been a gold-exporting country, and, as I before stated, we now have not in the entire country more than two hundred million dollars in gold, while our national indebtedness amounts to twenty-five hundred millions, and we annually export more than we produce. The production of California does not exceed $50,000,000 per annum, while there were exported to Europe—

I have not the data to give the export for the present year up to this time. For January it was reported at $8,000,000, or at the rate of ninety-six millions for the year. But as our supply is nearly exhausted, I do not suppose it will much exceed the production of our mines.

With these facts before us I again ask my loyal friend how he expects to pay these bonds in gold? If he admits that it cannot be done, and yet insists that we have no right to pay in anything but coin, it is he, and not I, that is the practical repudiator. But no man who has brains enough to count a hundred expects to liquidate this enormous debt at one time or by one single payment, and no sane man proposes to issue greenbacks merely for the purpose of paying the bonds therewith. We do not ask for an inflation of the currency. We do not argue that it would be right, wise, or just voluntarily to produce such inflation, nor do we purpose any such thing.

ALL RADICAL FINANCIAL MEASURES HAVE BEEN MISERABLE BLUNDERS AND FAILURES.

We ask you to stop your wolf cry of repudiation when we propose in good faith to pay these five-twenty bonds in strict compliance with the contract made by the Government, and to listen to us while we show how this can easily be done without additional taxation. All your financial schemes and measures are confessedly miserable blunders and failures, and notwithstanding the enormous sums wrung from the people by taxation the public debt now, in a time of profound peace, is actually increasing at the fearful rate of nearly ten million dollars per month, and the debt bearing coin interest is increasing at a still more fearful rate. Let me give the figures from the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PUBLIC DEBT NOW RAPIDLY INCREASING.

Debt bearing coin interest.

On the 1st of June, 1863, the debt bearing coin interest was.....	$2,020,827,841 80
On the 1st of May it was.....	1,963,378,291 80.

Increase in one month.....	$57,449,550 00
----------------------------	-----------------

Entire Debt.

June 1, 1863, the entire debt, less the cash in the Treasury, was.....	$2,510,243,886 74
On the 1st of May it was, less the cash in the Treasury.....	2,500,528,827 56

----------------------------	----------------

Thus it is seen that the increase in the public debt for the last month of which we have any official information was nearly ten million dollars, while for the same month the increase in the debt bearing gold interest was over fifty-seven millions, or at the rate of nearly two millions per day. It is rumored, and currently believed, that if a report had been made from the

HO. OF REPS.

Funding the National Debt—Mr. Marshall.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Treasury Department on the 1st of July it would have shown a still more fearful increase in our public liabilities. I cannot see how our financial affairs could well be worse managed than they are under Radical policy; and it seems that when you have so utterly and so completely failed, you might listen with some respect and some diffidence in your own infallibility to those who propose to show that all those evils can be easily and speedily remedied by the introduction of reforms plain, simple, and easily understood.

The five-twenty bonds outstanding on the 1st day of June amounted to $1,494,755,600, the annual interest on which amounts, in gold, to $89,645,386. The principal of this debt is clearly payable in legal-tender Treasury notes, as I have heretofore demonstrated. If we can pay this debt and get rid of this heavy burden of annual interest the residue of the debt will scarcely be felt, and can easily be disposed of. That this can be done I propose now to show.

As I have already stated, no one expects to pay this debt at one time or in one year. In fact there is scarcely sufficient gold coin in the whole world to pay our public debt in one payment. And we do not expect, whatever we may use as money or for a circulating medium, to have in circulation or to put in circulation at any time an amount of it equal to our present public indebtedness. We do not think this desirable. But every one knows that when business is active and the country prosperous one dollar kept actively employed, and passing from hand to hand, may in one year supply the medium of exchange for hundreds of transactions of one dollar each, or liquidate debts amounting to hundreds of dollars. It is not absolutely necessary that there should be any increase in our currency to enable us by proper reform in the administration to pay off this debt in a very short time, although I believe a considerable increase is at this time necessary for the purpose of giving activity to business and restoring prosperity to the country.

WIND UP NATIONAL BANKS AND SUBSTITUTE GREENBACKS FOR THEIR CURRENCY.

As we have for the present abandoned coin as a medium of exchange, and cannot speedily return to it without reducing the whole country to bankruptcy, it is certain that no substitute has been so popular with the people, or has answered its purpose so well, as the greenback currency. I will not now discuss the wisdom or policy of introducing this currency. We must now deal with facts as they are. The establishment of the national banks was a great blunder, if not a crime. If we are to have a paper currency the Treasury notes are the most popular, the safest, and the best secured. And if there is any profit to be derived from the issuance of a paper currency the Government, representing the entire people, and not private corporations or individuals, should be the beneficiaries thereof. Why these national banks were established I never could understand. Enormous profits have been made thereby, but the Government has lost and the public have not been benefited. To show the iniquitous and ruinous working of this banking system I will repeat what a gentleman on this floor states as having occurred in an eastern State within his own observation.

An association of gentlemen raised $300,000 in currency. They went to the office of the Register of the Treasury and exchanged their currency for $300,000 in six per cent. gold-bearing bonds. They then went into the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, in the same building, organized a national bank, deposited their $300,000 in bonds and received for their bank $270,000 in the national currency. They had let the Government have $30,000 in currency more than they received for banking purposes, and had on deposit $300,000 in bonds, on which they received as interest from the Government $18,000 a year in gold. This was pretty good financing for these bankers to receive $18,000 per annum in gold on the $30,000 in currency which they had thus loaned to the Government. But this is not the whole story. They had their bank made a public depository. They soon discovered that there was scarcely ever less than $1,000,000 of Government money deposited within their vaults. They did not like to see this vast sum lie idle. They therefore took $1,000,000 of this Government money and bought $1,000,000 of five-twenty bonds with it. In other words, they loaned $1,000,000 of the Government's own money to the Government, and deposited the bonds received in the vaults of their bank, on which they received from that same Government $60,000 in gold per annum as interest. Thus for the $30,000 in currency which they originally loaned the Government they were receiving in interest annually in all $78,000 in gold. And all this was under the regular operations of your banking law. This was certainly good financing for these cute Yankees, but what kind of financing is it for the Government, and when do you suppose we can get out of debt under such a system? All this must be changed. The Government has issued in this way to the various banks $300,000,000 in bank currency, and has received $330,000,000 in bonds on deposit as security. We propose to compel the withdrawal of this bank currency from circulation, and to substitute therefor $300,000,000 in legal-tender greenbacks, with which we will pay off that amount in five-twenty bonds. We thus get rid of the payment of $18,000,000 per annum of interest we are paying thereon, do not increase the volume of currency one cent, and have a better and more popular circulating medium. If we should set apart each year this $18,000,000, which we would otherwise be paying as interest, we would, with accumulations thereon, in a few years have a sufficient sum to liquidate the residue of the five-twenty bonds.

EXTRAVAGANCE AND CORRUPTION OF THE RADICAL PARTY.

But we demand other reforms even more important than this. Your administration of the Government has been reckless and extravagant beyond all precedent. The speculations and robberies perpetrated since your party has been in power are without a parallel in the history of the world. I appeal to facts for an affirmation of these charges. You have taxed the people as no people have ever been taxed before in any age or in any country. In the three years of peace since the close of the war you have raised from their hard earnings by the drag-nets you have spread out all over the land $1,500,000,000, a sum so enormous that the mind can scarcely grasp or comprehend it. If it were possible to raise this sum in silver dollars they would load forty-six thousand eight hundred and seventy-five wagons with two thousand pounds to each wagon; and if they were to be moved, allowing twenty rods for each wagon and team, it would form a train stretching out two thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine miles. You have raised from the people in one single year over five hundred and sixty million dollars. And yet with all this enormous taxation the public debt is at this moment rapidly increasing, as I have already shown. It has not required exceeding $140,000,000 at any time to pay the interest on the public debt. I arraign you before the world as guilty of high crimes against the people. I demand of you to plead and tell us what you have done with this money. You are now upon trial at the bar of an indignant and greatly wronged people. It is impossible that this enormous sum could have been expended in a legitimate and honest administration of the Government. I will contrast this iniquity with the expenditures of Administrations before your party came into power; and that the House and the country may fully comprehend the facts I will here produce some tables, one of which I have heretofore brought to the attention of the House:

Table giving the entire expenditures of the Federal Government, exclusive of the public debt, from the foundation of the Government to the close of the last British war.

From March 4, 1789, to December 31, 1791.	$1,910,509 52
1792.....	1,877,903 68
1793.....	1,710,070 26
1794.....	3,500,546 65
1795.....	4,350,658 04
1796.....	2,531,930 40
1797.....	2,833,590 96
1798.....	4,623,233 54
1799.....	6,480,166 72
1800.....	7,411,369 97
1801.....	4,981,660 90
1802.....	3,737,079 91
1803.....	4,002,824 24
1804.....	4,452,858 91
1805.....	6,357,234 62
1806.....	6,080,200 36
1807.....	4,984,572 89
1808.....	6,504,338 85
1809.....	7,414,672 14
1810.....	5,311,082 28
1811.....	5,592,604 86
1812.....	17,829,498 70
1813.....	28,082,396 92
1814.....	30,127,606 38
Total.....	$172,697,779 00

Thus it is seen that the entire expenditures of the Government from the adoption of the Constitution to the close of the last war with Great Britain did not amount to one third of what was raised from the people by taxation for the single year of 1866.

The average annual expenditures of the Government at different specified periods for the forty years immediately preceding the advent of the Republican party to power in 1861 were as follows, according to a table furnished by Hon. David A. Wells, Special Commissioner of Revenue, in his last annual report. Mr. Wells is a member of the Republican party, and of course does not misrepresent facts to the damage of his own party:

Average annual expenditures of the Government for periods of ten years each.

1821-31 (ten years).....	$18,170,000
1831-41 (ten years).....	25,030,000
1841-51 (ten years).....	35,740,000
1851-61 (ten years).....	60,680,000

The third of these periods (from 1841 to 1851) embraces the time of the Mexican war, and yet the average annual expenditures of this decade, including civil list, pensions, Indians, Navy and War Departments, do not reach $36,000,000. In view of these facts will some gentleman on the Radical side of the House tell the country why it is that it is necessary to raise from the people $500,000,000 a year, and that even with this enormous taxation the public debt is now rapidly increasing? These are questions answers to which an indignant people will demand of you when you appear before them again asking their suffrages. But these expenditures are not and cannot be necessary. Abolish your military governments in the South, by which you are supporting the negro governments established there. Reduce your large standing Army to what it ought to be in time of peace, a mere police force. Abolish your Freedmen's Bureau, by which you are teaching politics and laziness and vagabondism to your negro protégés. Reduce your expensive Navy, go back to the principles of economy and honesty, and introduce the necessary reforms in every branch of the service, and you can in this way save one hundred or one hundred and fifty millions more to be applied annually to the payment of the principal of these five-twenty bonds. The interest will in this way year by year be rapidly diminishing, and the amount saved thereby each year can also be applied to the payment of the principal of those bonds, and it requires no mathematician to see that in this way the entire five-twenty bond indebtedness may be liquidated in five or six years without any increase of either taxes or the currency.

DEMAND FOR AN ADDITIONAL ISSUE OF GREENBACKS.

But for myself I believe the business of the country requires and demands more money, and that we should have promptly an additional issue of the legal tender or greenback currency. I would make this not primarily to pay the public debt, but to supply the place of the millions destroyed under the mad and suicidal scheme of contraction, and because the money is needed by the people, would give renewed energy and activity to business, bring prosperity and joy to thousands who are now bowed down by embarrassments and despondency, enable the people more easily to bear the burdens of taxes, enhance the price of labor and produce, give a readier and more active market therefor, increase the public revenues, and thereby enable us the more easily and speedily to pay off our public debt.

"But," says my loyal friend, "an increase of the volume of the currency would depreciate its value and thereby produce widespread disaster." Facts are of more value than theories, however plausible they may be; and I propose to show by facts and figures that what I purpose would produce no such result. An unlimited issue would doubtless inflate and depreciate the currency, but I know of no one who contemplates any such thing.

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY A GRAVE BLUNDER.

The scheme of forcing a return to specie payments by the inauguration of the policy of a rapid contraction of the currency was most fallacious, and in its results has almost brought bankruptcy and ruin to our doors. At the close of the war the party in power had, by adopting the legal-tender Treasury note as the "lawful money" of the United States, banished gold from the country as a circulating medium. The entire business of the country had adjusted itself to the paper currency in our midst, and with an abundant circulating medium business was active and profitable in all portions of our country. The laborer found employment for his hands, and industry, activity, and thrift were seen in all our borders.

Did we at that time have too much money? I think not. The demand for it was increasing every day. Ten States shut out from us for four years, now left after their long struggle without any circulating medium, held up their supplicating hands imploring assistance. These ten million people would soon have absorbed a large portion of our currency. New enterprises were springing up all over the land; the Pacific and other railroads, new towns, cities, factories, &c., all demanding and requiring the use of immense sums of money. Hundreds of thousands of enterprising immigrants were flocking to our shores, and our population and enterprise were rapidly increasing; thus constantly, day by day, swelling the demand and necessity for an abundant medium of exchange.

At this very time, of all others the most inopportune, the policy of contraction was inaugurated. The business of the country at first but slightly felt the shock, then staggered under the increasing weight of the burden imposed, and finally stagnation and threatened ruin hung over every branch of business. If this had gone on much longer the paper currency would have been destroyed, and there would have been nothing to supply its place. We would not have returned to specie payments, but bankruptcy and ruin would have crushed Government and people alike. None have been benefited except those who have bonds or hoarded wealth. The purchasing power of their money has been greatly increased, but we are not one particle nearer specie payments than we were when this policy was inaugurated. To understand fully why business is so greatly depressed let us see what has been the extent of this contraction. It is in fact much greater than is commonly supposed.

CIRCULATION COMPARED.

On the 1st of September, 1865, the circulating medium consisted, in part, as follows:

United States notes.....	$433,160,569
Fractional currency.....	26,344,742
National bank notes.....	300,000,000
Compound-interest legal tender.....	217,024,160
Temporary loan certificates, 10 per cent.....	107,148,713
Certificates of indebtedness.....	85,093,000
Treasury five per cent. legal tenders.....	32,536,901
Treasury notes, legal tenders, past due and not presented.....	1,503,020
State bank notes.....	78,867,575

Of the above it will be noticed $684,138,950 were legal tender, to wit:

United States notes.....	$433,160,569
Five per cent. notes.....	33,954,230
Compound-interest notes.....	217,024,160

Total.....$684,138,950

On the 1st of January, 1868, the amount of currency in circulation of the description above mentioned was as follows:

United States notes and fractional currency.....	$388,405,565
National bank notes.....	300,000,000
Compound-interest notes and three per cent. certificates.....	78,165,170
State bank notes.....	4,000,000
Treasury notes.....	878,503
Temporary loan, 10 per cent.....	2,474,625
Certificates of indebtedness.....	30,000

Total contraction in two years and four months, $507,724,847, being a reduction of forty per cent.

Thus it is seen that in the short time of two years and three months there was a contraction of the circulating medium of our country of over five hundred million dollars. The contraction in legal tenders was two hundred and fifty millions. Has this unparalleled contraction reduced the price of gold or enhanced the value of national securities? Has it promoted the prosperity of the country? We all know it has not. Its effect has been to paralyze trade, suspend industries, and throw labor out of employment. In May, 1865, gold sold at less than thirty per cent. premium. It is to-day over forty-two.

THE ISSUE OF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS IN GREENBACKS FAVORED.

As contraction has not increased the value of legal tenders, or brought them and gold nearer together, a reasonable expansion within the limits of the demands and necessities of the country will not depreciate their value. It will bring multiplied blessings to millions of households, and will injure no one. It will facilitate the collection of taxes, increase our revenue, and enable us more easily and speedily to pay off our public debt.

The country demands and needs more money, and must have it from some source. I say let the Government supply it. Reissue the $250,000,000 in legal tenders that have been destroyed when it ought to have been paid on our bond indebtedness, and thus kept in circulation among the people. With this $250,000,000 pay that amount of the five-twenty bonds, stop the interest thereon, unfetter that amount of capital that is now sunk, non-taxable, and a burden, and put it in circulation among the people. This is no inflation. The people need the money. It would lessen our taxes and burdens, the five-twenty debt would soon be entirely paid, and it will bring gladness and joy to thousands of homes now oppressed with embarrassments and despondency.

This would not be inflation. As our country increases in population, wealth, and enterprise we will need more than this. In no commercial and prosperous country in the world is the supply of money so small as in ours. England has twenty-five dollars per head for her inhabitants; France has thirty, while we now have scarcely thirteen. This is a demand that the people will insist on, and your cry of "covert repudiation" will not turn them from their purpose.

ANOTHER REASON WHY THE BONDS SHOULD BE PAID NOW.

There is another reason strong and irresistible why we should commence paying off the bond debt now in the manner indicated, and complete it as speedily as possible. These bonds continually drain the money from the people, and tie up and centralize capital. Whenever an enterprising citizen makes one or two hundred thousand dollars, instead of building railroads, improving our farms or towns, or purchasing produce from the farmers, he will make an investment where he will run no risks, and can entirely escape the burdens of taxation. He will invest in these bonds, whereby in perfect ease and security he can retire from responsibility and duty to society, and as inevitably as fate draw his six or twelve thousand dollars per annum in gold as interest. You cannot tax him to support State, county, or town, or to keep up the roads on which he travels. If he has children his neighbor may be taxed to educate them, but you cannot reach him. Such a system cannot be defended. Those who try to fasten it on the country will soon hear the thunders of an indignant and aroused people.

CONCLUSION.

Let us pay off these bonds as speedily as possible. The manner in which it can be done has been in part indicated. Let us unfetter this capital that is thus tied up and put it in circulation among the people. Then again we will hear the hum of industry in our cities and in all our borders; towns and cities will spring up as if by magic; railroads and other means of intercommunication will be multiplied, and peace, prosperity, and happiness will bring joy and gladness to the hearts of our people. What a contrast this presents to the prospect held out by the bill now before us, of increasing the debt one third and fastening the incubus upon us without remedy or redress for forty years. Let the people without passion or prejudice judge between us, and settle this issue as their own interest, honor, and dignity demands.

NOTE.

The Funding Bill, which passed the House of Representatives during the last hour of its session, and the vote thereon in the House, are given below. It was not signed by the President, and consequently has not become a law. Those voting for it are all Republicans:

An act providing for the payment of the national debt, and for the reduction of the rate of interest thereon.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100, or any multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after thirty and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.; which said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed on other incomes, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the said bonds shall be exclusively used, par for par, for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present outstanding bonds of the United States known as the five-twenty bonds, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all such five-twenty bonds, and no more.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of the duties derived from imported goods the sum of $135,000,000 annually, which sum, during each fiscal year, shall be applied to the payment of the interest and to the reduction of the principal of the public debt, in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury or as Congress may hereafter direct; and such reduction shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

HO. OF REPS.

Position of our Country.

SPEECH OF HON. G. F. MILLER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 28, 1868,

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the position of our country attracts the attention of all those who feel a deep and abiding interest in its perpetuity. We are a nation less than a century old, and a few Pilgrims who left the land of their birth to avoid persecution and enable them to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience were in a great measure the founders of this Republic. We had to encounter severe wars. The first was that of the Revolution, which was caused by the cutting loose of our forefathers from the mother country on account of unjust laws and oppression. Seven years of bloody conflict achieved our final independence, which Great Britain reluctantly conceded on the 30th of November, 1782. The United States at that time contained a little less than three million people. The British Government not acting in good faith, a second war was declared on the 8th of June, 1812, in which our arms were again successful in maintaining our independence, and on the 24th day of December, 1814, a treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and Great Britain was signed at Ghent. Our population at that time had increased to a little over eight millions. The next war we had with a foreign Power was with Mexico, declared in 1845, in which we were again successful, and our flag carried and planted in the capital of that nation, which brought Mexico to terms satisfactory to the United States, and a treaty was concluded in February, 1848.

But of all our wars none equaled that of the late rebellion, known as the war of 1861. It was a mighty contest between freedom and slavery. On that issue depended this nation's destiny and the nation's life. More than half a million lives were sacrificed in defense of this Republic. For a while a dark cloud seemed to be hovering over us; but the hand of a beneficent Providence was with us, and freedom triumphed. Though we have succeeded by force of arms in putting down the rebellion, yet a great work remained to be done in regard to the eleven late rebel States, who claimed to have seceded, which, according to the census of 1860, contained in the aggregate, including slaves, a population of 9,259,677; and the question presented was upon what conditions shall they be admitted to representation, so as to afford a sufficient guarantee against another outbreak. The conflict of ideas is still upon us. Andrew Johnson, who had been put in nomination for Vice President in 1864, on the same ticket with the lamented Lincoln, when he was reelected as Chief Magistrate of this nation, and on the death of Mr. Lincoln succeeded to the Presidency, undertook to establish a policy of his own, by which those late rebel States were to be admitted to full political rights without any condition whatever or security against a future rebellion. This the Republican members of Congress would not assent to, and had they done so they would have been derelict in duty and proved false to the high trust committed to their charge. Hence the eruption between the Executive (Mr. Johnson) and Congress. The Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses had arduous duties to perform, and were determined to stand on the side of the people, notwithstanding the usurpation of the President, who vetoed every measure passed calculated to make sure and lasting peace to the country, and endeavored, with all the official power he possessed, to destroy the political party that placed him in office. But the Republican Congress were not to be daunted, and stood in solid phalanx, and by a two-thirds vote passed all wholesome and salutary laws over the vetoes. Congress, as a sure and safe guarantee, passed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by a two-thirds vote, known as article fourteen, which is as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

This was submitted to the several States for their ratification, but met with violent opposition on the part of the President. Tennessee, however, manfully adopted it, and was admitted to representation in Congress. It was then found necessary to adopt more stringent rules in regard to the government and reconstruction of the other late rebel States. And I am happy, Mr. Chairman, now to be able to say that all those eleven States, except three, have been reconstructed under the policy of Congress, and representatives therefrom admitted in both branches of Congress. The three remaining unreconstructed States and without representation are those of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, which, had it not been for the conduct of President Johnson, would also have adopted the proper measures to secure their admission. It was made a condition precedent that before any of the States who claimed to have seceded should be admitted to representation the Legislature of the State so applying should have ratified said constitutional amendment, and that now, by the notice published by the Secretary of State, it appears that three fourths of the entire States of this Union have ratified said amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, which makes it part of the Constitution, and affords security to these United States against the rebel debt, or any other unjust scheme that might be got up by those who were in sympathy with the late rebellion. When Ohio and New Jersey got a Democratic majority in their Legislatures they tried to withdraw the ratification of said amendment, but it was too late, and it only shows the opposition of the leaders of that party to any measure which is calculated to prevent rebels and their sympathizers from doing further mischief. As I have frequently remarked on other occasions, I look upon this amendment as the most important measure ever adopted, and the only one that gives adequate security to the tax-payers of the country and prevents a dismemberment of the Union. To change it will require two thirds of both Houses of Congress and three fourths of the States, which it is not likely can ever be obtained. We can now present to the country the prospect of a happy future, provided the policy already inaugurated by Congress should be sustained. Our national debt may be put down at $2,500,000,000, which is not discouraging when we take into consideration that we have now a population of about forty millions, and the vast resources of our extensive country, compared with that of other nations. We have reduced taxation very considerably, and still our revenue will enable us to pay the expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, and leave some to be applied toward the extinguishment of the principal. But to keep our country in a prosperous condition it is necessary that the policy of Congress which has heretofore been so nobly sustained by a grateful people should be maintained, and that can only be done effectually by electing the Republican candidates for the two highest offices in the gift of the American people. One of them, General Ulysses S. Grant, the candidate for the presidential chair, has led our armies to victory and quelled one of the greatest rebellions ever known in any country, and has shown himself to be possessed of not only superior military power, but that of legislative. In his hands our ship of State must be safe.

In SCHUYLER COLFAX, our candidate for Vice President, we have a man possessed of superior legislative powers; a man who would never betray the trust committed to him. These two candidates, like the late President Lincoln, have by their own merits risen from the humble walks of life to the conspicuous positions they now and will hereafter occupy. The Republican party, though but about twelve years old, having its foundation upon that of the old Whig party, is a powerful organization. It withstood the great conflict in the gigantic rebellion, and battled for rights. It spurned with indignation executive encroachments which were calculated to endanger the safety of the Republic. This country has wiped from its escutcheon the dark stain of slavery, which was looked upon by the nations of the earth as a stigma and inconsistent with a republican form of government.

As to negro suffrage, which seems to have agitated the public mind, it has been adopted in the reconstructed States; but as to the States that remained loyal, it is left for the people to decide, though in the State of New York the negro long since exercised under their constitution that right, though with a property qualification attached, and it was also exercised in certain other northern States. As to Pennsylvania, that question rests entirely with the people, a majority of whom are to decide under our State constitution.

We are now, Mr. Chairman, soon to separate and return to our constituents, whom we have endeavored faithfully to serve, and it is for them to approve or disapprove of what we have done. One thing I can truly say, that our object has been to legislate for the welfare and perpetuity of this Republic, and I trust that this great nation, whose flag now waves in triumph in every ocean, shall continue to prosper, and our form of government be an example for other nations to imitate.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that the masses of the late rebellious States will find that the policy of Congress is calculated to elevate and place their States in a higher and more prosperous condition than they ever occupied before, and one that a majority of the entire people shall govern, and not an aristocratic minority; one where the dignity of manhood shall be fully realized, the intellect expanded, and the achievements of free labor sought and developed to their highest and noblest ends.

SPEECH OF HON. T. WILLIAMS,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 9, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my apology for claiming the privilege of declaring my reasons for voting against this bill consists only in the transcendent importance of the principles involved. Next to the great work of reconstruction, I know no question of the day, or of any day, so full of interest to this nation, or bearing so largely on its welfare in the long future to which I had fondly hoped that it was destined. The step into which this reckless and ruinous Administration, with the aid of a subsidized press, and by the profligate use of all that machinery of fraud and imposture which it can so readily command, is endeavoring to hurry us without any intelligible motive, unless it be to revenge itself upon the nation whose confidence it has so justly forfeited, involving as it does a first departure from our traditional policy, and launching us at once upon a new career, fraught, as I verily believe it is, with infinite perils to those who are to come after us, is one which I cannot contemplate without the deepest concern. I had hoped that this cup would be permitted to pass away. There was so little about it to invite, and so much to shock and repel, that it seemed impossible that this House could be brought to drink it. It looks now as though I was mistaken, and it is not in my judgment one of the least of the ill omens that cloud the horizon of the future, that such a result could have been achieved under such unpromising circumstances. I cannot hope to avert it by anything that I can say. If this House can listen with patience, and even with approval, to such arguments as have been employed to secure its suffrage for a measure such as this, it would be idle in me to expect that anything which I can offer would weigh a feather against it. All I have to ask, therefore, is the privilege of registering my earnest and solemn protest in such a form as will carry to the people the reasons upon which I have been constrained to think that fidelity to the Constitution and a proper regard for their highest and best interests imperatively required of me the warning I have to utter, and the vote which I am about to give.

The first question here is as to the power, not so much of Congress as of the House, to refuse the appropriation required to carry this so-called treaty for the purchase of foreign territory into effect—not the physical power of course—not the power generally to disregard a treaty at the expense of good faith and at the risk even of war—but the moral power, by which I mean the right, to refuse the aid which the contract stipulates, and without which it is well settled that it cannot have the force of law. And this, in the present case, is not the question of the right to refuse an appropriation generally, but only of the right to refuse it in the case of a negotiation for the purchase of foreign territory. If it has no such power, there is an end of all controversy except upon the single question—not whether the bargain, if fairly made, was a good or a bad one, but whether it is so manifestly against the interests of the nation to ratify the act, as to make it our duty to refuse the necessary aid at the risk of any legitimate consequences that might follow the refusal.

The report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations admits that the House has a right to consider the merits of a treaty, and to determine whether its object is within the scope of the treaty power, and that, if found to be in conflict with the fundamental principles, or purposes, or interests, of the Government, it would be justified not only in withholding its aid, but in treating the agreement itself as not binding on the nation, while it is only claimed that Congress is bound to give it effect where it is not inconsistent with the spirit and purposes of the Government.

These admissions even with the exception claimed, which is obviously in conflict with the conceded right to consider the agreement on its merits, would seem to be broad enough to satisfy the extremist advocate of the powers of this House. If it may determine whether the object is within the scope of the treaty power; if it would be justified in not only withholding its aid, but in giving notice to the parties interested, that the agreement will not be regarded as binding on the nation wherever it finds it to be in conflict with the fundamental principles, purposes, or interests of the Government; if, in a word, it is only bound to give it effect as a contract, where it is not inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of the Government, then it has the entire control of the subject, and may do everything that has ever been claimed for it. The exception itself is but the affirmation of the doctrine that wherever the treaty is in conflict with the true meaning of the Constitution it can have no binding force upon the country.

These opinions are but the expression of the rule of the public law, that no contract made by the sovereign is ever held to be obligatory on the nation, if it is at war with the fundamental law of the State. I should not, therefore, in the face of such concessions, have thought it necessary to say a word in their support, if the position taken by the honorable chairman himself in the debate had not seemed to me to be in such obvious conflict with his own admissions as to amount to a virtual retraction of all that he had previously conceded, while the arguments of most of his coadjutors, even while asserting, like him, the right of the House to deliberate, were equally inconsistent and illogical in the assertion that a bargain once made by the President and Senate, involving the payment of money for this or any other purpose, was binding upon the conscience of the nation, and could not be rightfully repudiated in any imaginable case. If I have correctly understood these gentlemen, they have left to the Congress, of which they are themselves a part, no more than the very humble duty of carrying out the will of an acknowledged superior; and judging from the general expression, I think it may be safely said that if this untoward measure is to pass, it will owe its success far more to the idea that we are concluded by what has been done by others without our knowledge or consent, than by any favorable opinion of the merits of a transaction which nobody here would have advised, and few would care to venture to defend. I do not so esteem of my own rights as a Representative. As a member of this House I cannot but deplore the self-abnegation which would ignore its high functions as a legislative body, intrusted specially by the Constitution with the control of the public purse, and degrade it into a mere subordinate to an inferior member of the State, the ordinary executor only of its own will. I trust, therefore, I shall be excused for giving to this worse than self-denying, this monstrous and indefensible heresy, a much fuller consideration than it might seem otherwise to have deserved.

The question as to the extent of the treaty-making power under the Constitution, and the general authority of Congress to deliberate, and of course decide for itself, upon the expediency of carrying into effect a treaty made by the President with the concurrence of the Senate, wherever it contains stipulations on any subject committed to its jurisdiction, is one that has been largely discussed on two several occasions in our history. The first was upon the treaty with Great Britain in 1794, for the adjustment of existing disputes, and the regulation of commerce and navigation between the two countries; and the second upon the treaty of commerce and navigation with the same Power in 1815. The result of the former was that although the laws required for the purpose eventually approved themselves to the judgment of the House, they were only passed on grounds of expediency, after a protest in the shape of a solemn resolution of that body, asserting that—

"In all cases where a treaty stipulates regulations on any subject committed by the Constitution to Congress it must depend for its execution as to such stipulation upon a law or laws to be passed by Congress, and that it is the constitutional right and duty of the House in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

In the latter case, where the effect of the stipulation was only to interfere with existing laws, the same doctrine was substantially affirmed by both Houses in the passage of a law agreed upon after a conference between them, declaring that—

"So much of any act or acts of Congress as imposed a duty on tonnage contrary to the provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain should from and after the date of that instrument, and during its continuance, be void and of no effect."

How far this opinion was authorized, will appear by a reference to the Constitution and to those principles of public law that bear upon the case.

There are but two clauses in that instrument which refer directly to the treaty-making power. The first of these is that which provides that the President—

"Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senate concur."

The second is that which enacts that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

It is not to be disputed, therefore, that the treaty-making power is exclusively in the President and Senate, and that the treaties made by them are to have the same force as the laws enacted by Congress itself, and no more, while in strictness of speech they are not laws except by force of the Constitution.

If this grant of power stood alone it would, of course, impart to the President and Senate all the faculties that ordinarily belong to the sovereign in this particular, it being an essential and inherent attribute of every sovereignty to make treaties for the regulation of its external relations and intercourse.

It is not to be understood, however, that even in this aspect of the case the authority of the usual organ is absolute. It is a well-settled principle of public law that—

"Any thing that has been promised by the chief or his agent beyond the limits of the authority with which the State has intrusted him, is at most no more than a simple promise, (promissio), which only obliges the promiser to use his endeavors to procure its ratification."—Martin's L. U., chap. 1, sec. 3, p. 49.

Even the stipulation of a monarch, though he should be absolute, cannot be valid if it militates against the fundamental law of the State, unless ratified by the nation. (Ibid.)

But the treaty-making power is only a part, and a very subordinate one, of our Constitution of Government, which is a complex machine, whose several parts must be made to work in such a way as to move together without jar or collision, and in entire harmony with each other, so as to accomplish the general object to which they are all subordinate. That object has reference mainly to the interior life of the people for whose benefit the instrument was contrived. All that lies beyond this province, and relates to what is only external, is but incidental and auxiliary to the general purpose, and is not, therefore, to be interpreted so as to impair or destroy any of the vital functions of the State.

It is to be observed, however, in the first place, that as among the powers that are coördinate that which is endowed with the superior function of making the laws—of which the others are but the ministers—is, of course, preëminent in dignity and degree, so in the very forefront of the Constitution stands the great and fundamental provision that—

"All legislative power therein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

It seems clear, then, that although all treaties made under the authority of the United States are declared to be a part of the supreme law, and as such obligatory on the judges of the several States, it was not supposed by the framers of the Constitution that the function of making them was a legislative power. And this is in accordance with the general idea that they are but in the nature of contracts between nations, and are not to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature except where they operate per se, and without the aid of any legislative provision. (Story's Com., sec. 1508; Foster vs. Nielson, 1 Peters; Turner vs. Am. Bapt. Miss. Union, 5 M'Clain, 344.)

But the Constitution does not stop here. After thus declaring that all legislative power therein granted shall be vested in a Congress, it proceeds to particularize and define precisely what these powers shall be, and among those enumerated are the authority to levy and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a Navy, to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property of the United States, and to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of these powers.

Is there anything, then, in the treaty-making power to interfere with, or abridge any of the important functions thus expressly assigned to the law maker? May it levy and collect taxes, or borrow or appropriate money, or regulate commerce, or declare war, or raise and support armies by virtue of an alliance offensive and defensive with one of two belligerents? Or can it legally stipulate to do either of these things without the voluntary consent or coöperation of that department of the Government to which they are especially intrusted? If it may, the express grant of the whole legislative power to Congress over all these subjects is subordinate to the claims of the treaty-making power, and it may revolutionize the Government and become the complete master of the State by usurping the whole functions of the Legislature. Nay, more; as it is unrestricted in its terms, as the Congress is not, it may even transcend the limits of that department itself upon the doctrine of the advocates of this bill.

But there is no rule of construction that can support such an interpretation. It is admitted by Story that "although this power is general and unrestricted it is not to be so construed as to destroy the fundamental law of the State." "A power given by the Constitution," he continues, "cannot be construed to authorize the destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and cannot supersede or interfere with any of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other. A treaty to change the organization of the Government, or annihilate its sovereignty, or overturn its Republican form, or to deprive it of its constitutional powers would be void." (Story's Com., sec. 1508.) And Chancellor Kent, referring to the admission of Vattel, (book 1, chap. 20, p. 244; Ibid., chap. 21, sec. 262; book 4, chap. 2, secs. 11 and 12,) that the fundamental law of a nation may withhold the power of alienation by treaty, remarks that—"It would seem by necessary inference to be a violation of the fundamental law for the treaty-making power, acting under such an instrument as the Constitution of the United States, to agree by treaty for the abolition or alteration of any part of the Constitution. The stipulation would go to destroy the very authority, for making the treaty."—Kent's Com., 166, Note.

It may be added to this that where a power is expressly conferred by description and enumeration, as in the case of those vested by the Constitution in Congress, it is not to be taken away by implication, or, in other words, by giving to the acts of another and coördinate authority the mere force of a supreme law so far only as regards the constitutions and the laws of the several States. Where it is general it may be limited by exceptions; but where it is special, even an express reservation to the extent of the grant itself, would be void for the repugnancy, unless upon the hypothesis that the powers in question were intended to be concurrent. That, however, is the very question in dispute. The argument here is that the treaty-making power is supreme, and of course exclusive; that it may not only repeal all existing laws, but oblige the Legislature to enact just such others as it may stipulate on any of the subjects expressly committed by the Constitution to its own hands.

Nor is it an answer to say that the terms of the Constitution are satisfied by the fact that the office of executing the will of the treaty-making power is in the hands of Congress, and to be performed by it. The power to legislate is a power to deliberate, which implies a power to refuse. It is of its very essence that the will of the agent should be free. If it may be coerced by the pressure of a supposed moral obligation, reinforced by a possible menace of war, he is but the blind instrument of a superior, and it is difficult to see why he might not, on principle, be compelled by mandamus to the performance of what would then be no better than a mere ministerial duty. The councils or legislators of a political corporation have been more than once constrained to levy and collect taxes for the payment of a corporate obligation. The difference would be only one of dignity or degree.

But it does not follow that the treaty-making power must fail, because it cannot be allowed to displace the law-giver, by usurping his functions or subordinating him into the mere creature of its will. While it is clear that in a case of manifest repugnancy, the latter and inferior grant must give way, it is an equally well-settled rule of construction, that it must be supported, if it can be made to stand along with the other without a conflict, in order to give effect, if possible, to all the parts of the instrument, or, in the usual technical phrase, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. If the treaty-making power be so exercisable as not to interfere with the authority specially and expressly conferred on Congress, it must be held to operate only to that extent, and in that way.

The resolution of 1796 asserts that in all cases where a treaty stipulates regulations on any subject committed by the Constitution to Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations upon a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and the act of 1816, already referred to, affirms the same idea. It may be doubted, however, whether there is any possible case of a stipulation within the scope and meaning of the Constitution upon any subject that is not committed to Congress, as it seems clear that there is none outside of its constitutional powers, in which it could be made competent to act even by the authority of a treaty. The effect, then, of this doctrine would seem, in strictness, to be to require the assent of the Legislature in all cases whatever.

I am not quite prepared, however, to go that length, nor is it essential to the support of my conclusions in the present case, that I should. But it may be admitted that there are treaties that operate per se, or execute themselves, either by establishing a new rule, or possibly repealing an existing law, while there are others which involve stipulations that are dependent on the action of the Legislature, and necessitate its intervention to carry them into effect, and which, therefore, by the introduction of this new element, must necessarily turn over the whole question to the power which they have invoked, unless the action of that power may be bargained for in a way entirely at war with its very nature, and its whole constitution and purposes. In the one case the treaty is perfect, while in the other it is imperfect.

Nor is this distinction a fanciful one. It has the support of authority as well as reason. In the case of Foster et al. vs. Nielson, 2 Peters, 314, it is said by the Supreme Court:

"Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature, wherever it operates by itself, without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract where either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political and not to the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule of the court"—which is to say, in effect, "before it can become a law."

The same doctrine is held in the case of Turner vs. the American Baptist Missionary Union, 5 M'Clain, 344, where the court holds the following language:

"A treaty under the Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This unquestionably applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be, the supreme law of the land, when the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as when the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative in the sense of the Constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of the Government can be regarded as law until it shall have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law as that a treaty which engages to pay a sum of money is in itself a law. And in such cases the Representatives of the people of the States exercise their own judgments in granting or withholding the money. They act upon their own responsibility, and not on the responsibility of the treaty-making power. It cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect; and every foreign Government may be presumed to know that so far as the treaty stipulates to pay money the legislative action is required."

And again, in Taylor vs. Martin, 2 Curtis, 454, it is remarked by the court that—

"To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons that approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of the nation is a matter of the utmost gravity and delicacy; but the power to do so is a prerogative of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power in any case I do not believe. That it must reside somewhere and be applicable to all cases I am convinced. I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress."

But the present case is distinguishable from those which have been referred to, and indeed from all others that have gone before it, in the important fact that it is not so much a treaty (foedus) as a mere bargain (pactum transitorium) for the purchase and cession of a large territory separated from that of this nation by the dominions of another Power, and not in any way connected with, or incidental to the settlement of any dispute even as to boundaries.

Whether a transaction of this sort is to be regarded in strictness as a treaty, within the meaning of the terms as used by the framers of the Constitution, is a question that does not seem to have been even mooted in any of the debates, or by any of the commentators on that instrument. In my humble judgment it is not. Provinces and even kingdoms have often changed hands, we know, as the result of wars, but so unfrequently as mere subjects of traffic, that few, if any, even of the publicists, have condescended to include a negotiation of this sort in their disquisitions on the general question. But this is not all. It is said by Martens (Lib. 2, pp. 52, 53) that—

"It is only treaties of peace, alliance, commerce, and others of that sort, which are to be fulfilled respectively only as the occasion presents itself, which are called treaties in the more particular sense, (foederata), in opposition to transitory covenants."

And to the same effect Vattel defines a treaty, in Latin foedus, as "a compact made with a view to the public welfare by the supreme power, either for perpetuity, or for a considerable time;" (Book 2, chap. 12, sec. 152,) distinguishing in the next following section, the compacts which have temporary matters for their object, and are accomplished by a single act, and not by repeated acts, under the designation of "agreements, conventions, and pactions." (Ibid., sec. 153.) And the same distinction is observed in our own public transactions with foreign Powers, as reference to the treaty volumes of the Statutes-at-Large will show.

It is not unworthy of remark at this point that the word treaty, in its general sense, has been used among us to refer to the character of the parties rather than to the subject-matter of the contract, and, if correctly, would bring the purchase of a vessel of war by the emperor of Russia from the Government of the United States, as fully within its meaning as that of an unexplored and uninhabited territory. To suppose, however, that the power here given was intended to apply to such a case, would not seem to be reasonable in view of the fact that the object of the provision, as generally conceded, was only to regulate the intercourse with foreign nations, and to settle and adjust such controversies as might arise between them, which was, of course, an essential power. It cannot be said that it is an essential power to any Government to buy and sell and make merchandise of territorial possessions or people. To ascertain whether it exists here we must look into the Constitution itself. If it is not there, or if there be anything in the exercise of such a power at war with the spirit and genius of our institutions, then it clearly does not exist, and the word itself is entitled to no such construction, against the accepted sense, as will embrace it when it may be so justly interpreted as to save the Constitution.

There is no pretense, however, that the purchase or cession of foreign territory is within any of the powers expressly enumerated in the Constitution, (Story's Com., sec. 1285;) and it has been often remarked that it is incredible that any such overwhelming authority should have been confided to the national Government with the consent of the people of the old States. It is well known, moreover, that one of the principal objections urged against the Constitution itself was that even the original territory was too large for a national Government. With such an understanding, it could not obviously have commanded votes enough to secure its adoption.

It will be remembered, however, that even Mr. Jefferson himself, solicitous as he was for the acquisition of Louisiana, which was due, as we know to his own exertions mainly, was obliged to admit that there was no authority whatever in the Constitution for the purchase of that territory. In his letter to Mr. Breckinridge, of the date of August 12, 1803, he says:

"This treaty must, of course, be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably be never again in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into the Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of the country has done an act beyond the Constitution. The Legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on the country for doing for them what we know they would have done for themselves."

He then proceeds to compare the case to that of a guardian who has invested the money of his ward without authority of law, and who if afterward challenged could only say, "I did this for your good. I pretend to no right to bind you. You may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty to risk myself for you." (4 Corr., 500.)

Again, in his letter to Mr. Nicholas of the date of September 7, 1803, he says:

"When I consider that the limits of the United States are precisely defined by the treaty of 1796, and that the Constitution declares itself to be made for the United States, I cannot help believing that the intention was not to permit Congress to admit new States which should be formed out of the territory for which and under whose authority they were then acting. I do not believe it was meant that they should receive England, Ireland, or Holland, which would be the case on your construction. When an instrument admits of two constructions, one safe and the other hazardous, I had rather ask an enlargement of power than assume it by a construction that would render our power boundless. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. I say the same as to those who consider the grant of the treaty-making power as boundless. If it is, then we have no Constitution."—4 Corr., 506.

It has been argued on the other hand that the right to acquire territory is an incident to national sovereignty; that it was a resulting power growing out of the aggregate powers; that it was for the common defense and for the general welfare. And it has been asserted by the Supreme Court that the Constitution confers the power of making war and making treaties, and consequently of acquiring territory, either by conquest or treaty. (Am. In. Co. vs. Carter, 1 Pet., pp. 511, 542, 517, note; Story, sec. 1287.)

How it can be shown that the right to acquire territory is an inseparable incident to national sovereignty is a point that is not explained. What national sovereignty is I do not know, unless it be the supreme power of the State, in which case, I suppose it would reside, of course, with the organ that enacts the laws. If it be, however, a necessary incident, then national sovereignty is absolutely impossible in a Government whose limits are so precisely defined by the terms of its fundamental law as to preclude any enlargement thereof. There is nothing, therefore, in this argument.

Is it to be found, then, as a result of the aggregate powers? That is but the totality of the specific and individual powers, which means no more than the Government itself, and is, in effect, but a repetition in other words of the proposition that goes before it. But by what chemistry is the sum of these powers to result in a product so different from the elements of which it is compounded? How is a sweet fountain to be made to send forth bitter waters? Is it essential to the exercise of any of these powers that the nation should acquire additional territory? Nobody will pretend it.

Is it essential, then, to the common defense and the general welfare? That was the argument in the Louisiana case, to which there is no parallel here; but it is to be remembered that it was invoked there not to give a construction to the Constitution, but only to excuse an admitted violation of it. It is sufficient to say, however, that it has not been usual for jurists to look for the law to the preamble of a statute, and that if the opinion of Congress as to what is necessary to the common defense and general welfare is to be the measure of its powers under the Constitution, instead of the body of the Constitution itself, then these powers are illimitable, and we might as well dispense with the instrument altogether.

But then it has been somewhat loosely said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case already cited, that the Constitution confers the power of making war and making treaties, and consequently of acquiring territory by either conquest or treaty. This, I think, is about as fair a specimen of a non sequitur as could be well imagined. There may be wars without conquests. When we overran Mexico, one of the most desirable regions on the globe, we restored it, because it was not considered to be our interest, or perhaps our right, to acquire territory in this way, while it is now proposed to overleap the domains of another Power for the purpose of buying at a high price another territory that is not only forbidding in all its aspects, but absolutely worthless. And so, too, there may be treaties without the acquisition of territory. Even when it is an element, and but an incidental one, the cases are exceptional. Where, however, it is not only the principal, but the only object, it is not, as already shown by the authorities, the case of a treaty properly so called at all.

It is to be remarked, moreover, that it is not as an original power that the case is treated by the judge. He does not find it there because there is anything in the Constitution to authorize a purchase, but only because it contains a provision to authorize a treaty, which is gratuitously assumed to authorize anything that may be made the subject of treaty between independent nations by the general public law, or, in other words, any imaginable contract without reference to the structure of the Government, or the limitations of its fundamental law. This, however, is a position which has the support of no authority, and is entirely at war with every sound principle of interpretation. It has never been pretended by anybody, until it became necessary in the present case, that the treaty power was not limited as to its objects by the Constitution. When it was objected in the great debate on Jay's treaty in 1796, by those who were opposed to it, that inasmuch as the powers of Congress were expressly limited, while those of the President and Senate in this particular were not, the effect of the doctrine contended for by its advocates would be to make the treaty power uncontrollable and absolute, it was well and conclusively answered that it was absurd to suppose that it was not subject to all the limitations of the Constitution. It seems to me, however, that most of the defenders or apologists of this unrighteous and unprecedented bargain have taken the ground that the treaty power covered every possible subject of negotiation, as they have generally assumed, in utter contempt of the decisions of the courts, that a contract made by the President and Senate was a perfect treaty, without conceding that it made any difference whether it came within the scope of the Constitution or not, and without even condescending to respond to the objection that there was nothing in the Constitution to authorize the purchase of foreign territory.

It may be assumed, then, I think, upon this presentation of principles and authorities not only that the large concessions of the report itself as to the powers of this House were well authorized by the law, but that there was nothing whatever in this grant of the treaty-making power even to furnish a color of authority for the making of such contract. As to so much of the argument as puts the case on the supposed technical advantage to be derived from the bald and unworthy trick of a hurried occupancy, intended so obviously to force upon the House and country an agreement which it was well understood that neither would have made itself, even in the most favorable condition of our finances, I shall reserve what I have to say until I come to look into the question of the friendly relations between the contracting Powers with which it has been so dexterously associated. And now as to the merits of the acquisition itself.

It was scarcely to be expected in the face of the notorious fact that the territory in question was a terra incognita even to Russia itself at the very time of the munificent and mysterious offer, by which the Czar was no doubt as much surprised as ourselves, that anybody would be bold enough to claim that it had anything to recommend it except, perhaps, an exaggerated application of the Monroe doctrine, in view of the fact that it was a part of the North American continent. No sooner, however, is the extraordinary overture of the Secretary, who, with the restless spirit of the wandering Jew, had just been scouring sea and land with a chest of gold in quest of something that he might buy, accepted, than every engine which the Government can command is set to work to impress Congress and the nation with the idea of the immense value of the miserable property for which their credit had been so wantonly pledged. Never was an honest cause supported or required to be supported by such extraordinary means. Never, indeed, in the annals of imposture has anything been witnessed so reckless and audacious in the way of invention as the statements which have been manufactured to accomplish this object. By a miracle as stupendous as that of Joshua when he held the sun spellbound on Gibeon and the moon in the valley of Ajalon, the very laws of nature—the same to which the honorable chairman so confidently refers—are not only suspended but overturned at the bidding of the wizard Secretary. The pen of the mercenary scribe is enlisted to furnish material for the statesman. The sybil-like leaves of these oracular personages, this hireling priesthood of the press, descend in showers like the snowflakes that load the atmosphere of this promised land. The icy barriers before which even the giant power that had cleft its way through the snows of Siberia to the shores of the Arctic ocean, was obliged to recoil, give way at once. The frozen rivers heave their flowing bosoms to the embraces of a tropic sun, and the rugged and inaccessible mountains sink down incontinently into the verdant slope and the grassy plain. And young America, always susceptible, yes, and very old America, too, listen and believe. Already they hear, or think they hear, the scream of the American eagle from the peak of St. Elias, and as their eyes are skillfully directed to the exiled banner of the Union drooping disconsolately from its staff amid the perpetual rains of Sitka, respond to the stirring appeal by swearing on the altar of the god Terminus that it shall never go back, even though the elements in mutiny may wage eternal war around it and against it.

Nay, even the grave chairman, to whom the nation looks for wise and wary counsel, transported by the glowing vision, is rapt into ecstasy himself, and even while challenging the wild fancy that peopled Oonalaska's shore with wolves, finds a new El Dorado among the icebergs and volcanoes of this new Eden, before which the riches of ancient Ophir and the marvels of Cathay must pale. The poet, who has a license, as the statesman has not, was true at least to the law of verisimilitude, when he assigned to that savage beast a home in this new purchase, for which he could imagine no other inhabitant. If he forgot that there are regions of the earth where even a wolf could not subsist, and would disdain to live, he has atoned at least for the error of the naturalist in the glorious rhythm that blends so well the dismal howl of that animal with the sullen dash of the breakers upon that desolate shore. But what is there in the way of license here to compare with the inventive genius that has sown the gifts of Ceres among the driving mists and the eternal snows, and with a marvelous alchymy transmuted the sterile rock and the inaccessible glacier into the richest of metals and the most priceless of gems?

Unlooked for as was the argument upon the intrinsic value of a region of the earth so marked throughout by all those features which have sealed it against human access, and stamped upon its face the irreversible decree of the Almighty, that it shall never be the home of civilized man, I think I do not exaggerate in what I have said as to the character of this argument. Those who will turn to the speech of the honorable chairman will find that it is upon this point mainly that he has expended his stores of rhetoric. Rich as he is in elocution, the powers of language almost fail him in his endeavors to depict the varied and endless resources of this new acquisition. Without even the trouble of an exploration, he gives his hand and his faith implicitly to the voracious penny-a-liner, who guides him to the mount of vision, and there unfolds to his wondering eyes the mysteries of this untrodden and enchanted land. He sees, not with the visual orb, but as Sancho saw his mistress, by hearsay, in this chaos of rock and mountain, and wintry flood, a boundless area of cultivable land, that only waits the surveyor and the plow to be thronged with settlers, and to dimple into harvests; timber for construction and export, huge "as the pines hewn on Norwegian hills, to make the mast of some great admiral," and indestructible as the bodies of the unburi'd Esquimaux found by the first explorers on its northernmost point, which laughed the worm to scorn, and defied alike the tooth of time and of the polar bear; treasures of mineral wealth deep hid from mortal eyes, in beds of coal, and ores of iron, lead, copper, silver, and even gold, with probable platina and possible diamonds; forests alive with fur-bearing animals, just waiting to ornament the fair shoulders of some Atlantic belle, and fishes swarming upon the coast, until they are crowded out of their native element, and compelled to pasture upon the strand. And as he describes all this in a speech of two hours, with a creative power that never flags, we turn involuntarily to the six days' work so eloquently paraphrased by Milton for the only parallel. He speaks, "Let agriculture thrive and homes for settlers grace this rugged clime," and lo!

"The bare earth till then
Desert and bare, unsightly, unadorn'd,
Brings forth the tender grass, whose verdure clothes
Her universal face with pleasant green."

Let forests crown the hills!

"Straight rise, as in dance, the stately trees.
Let fish be multiplied, and in the seas
And lakes and running streams the water fill."

"Forthwith the sounds and seas, each creek and bay,
With fry innumerable swarm, and shoals
Of fish that with their fins, and shining scales,
Glide under the green wave in sculls that oft Bank the mid sea."

Is it surprising that in view of all the facts he tells us of this new Arcadia, he should so far forget the miserable savage who has so despised the gifts of nature and of Providence, as to burrow in the earth for more than half the year, and draw his whole subsistence from the sea, as to ask, as he does, with an air of triumph, where is there a people in all the earth with the same abundant materials for industry? But why should he have found it necessary to verify them by the eminently logical inference that because those who decried the successive acquisitions of Louisiana, and Florida, and Texas, and California, have turned out to be mistaken, all that the Arctic voyager has told us of the frozen zone is necessarily untrue, when we all know so well that a Republican ownership of six months, with the concentrated blaze of a hundred hireling pens would thaw out even the pole itself? And why also should he have found it necessary to magnify the value of this priceless acquisition by a reference to the somewhat apocryphal and damaging fact, that two previous Administrations had been capable of the meanness of offering for it in vain the paltry sum of only $5,000,000?

But how are the facts? Let me invite him and his auditors down for a little while from this glorious heaven of invention, and see how these things look, not through the kaleidoscope which the honorable gentleman presents to our eyes, but under the sober and philosophic light of the geography, topography, and history of the region in question.

The territory contracted for extends from about the sixtieth parallel to the latitude of 71° 20' on the Arctic sea, with a mean width of about 25°, or from seven to eight hundred miles, with two long tongues of land, one on the east, extending southwardly along the coast to the line of the British possessions at 54° 40', with an average width of about thirty miles, and the other on the southwest, comprising the peninsula of Alaska, along with the Aleutian isles. A large portion of it, therefore, is within the Arctic zone.

This part of the continent was first discovered in 1741 by the Russian admiral, Behring, who did not however land, but perished on his return voyage, along with his crew, of cold and hunger, on one of the islands near the Asiatic coast. It was again visited in 1778 by Captain Cook, who made the land at the inlet which has since borne his name, and which he supposed at first to be the northeastern passage around the continent, of which he was in search. Finding himself mistaken, he coasted westward along the southern shore, and the peninsula of Alaska, until he found a passage among the islands, which led him through the straits into the Arctic ocean, where he continued to push through the driving flocks as far as Icy Cape, in longitude 162°, where his further progress was arrested by a firmly frozen sea. For nearly half a century from this time no further exploration was attempted, until Captain Beechey in 1826 succeeded in penetrating as far as Point Barrow, in 71° 20', which is the highest northern latitude of Russian America. Some years afterward the attempt was made by Sir John Franklin to reach the same point from the mouth of Mackenzie river on the east, but he failed after the most persistent efforts to accomplish the task, and it was not until 1837 that the object was achieved by Dease and Simpson, two of the Hudson Bay Company's servants, with a boat's crew from the mouth of the Mackenzie, while within a few days afterwards, an expedition fitted out by the Russian-American Fur Company, succeeded in reaching the same point from the West, just in time to see the natives collected for the purpose of cutting off the British party, and were obliged to decamp at once in order to avoid the same fate themselves. And these are the only adventurers who have ever succeeded in tracing the coast line upon the Arctic ocean. Whether the United States Coast Survey, which will of course follow the disposition of the Arctic lands among American settlers, under the auspices of Mr. Seward, will fare better, remains to be tried.

In the mean while, however, a few Russian adventurers had founded an establishment at the island of Kodiak, with a view to the commerce in furs with the Asiatic coast, which was, however, subsequently removed to the island of Sitka. A fort was afterward established at Norton's sound, and several expeditions sent into the interior, which resulted in the establishment of a chain of trading posts from Dixon's entrance to Norton's sound, and the discovery of two considerable rivers, the Kuskokvim and the Yukon, with a country along their banks covered generally with lakes and morasses, and skirted by lofty and in some cases volcanic mountains. The latter and larger of these rivers was first explored in 1842-43 by Lieutenant Zagoyskin, who ascended it to a point about two hundred miles above Nulato, which is in latitude 64° or thereabouts, and about one hundred and fifty miles in a direct line from the coast; but the inherent difficulties of the task, along with the fierce and intractable disposition of the natives, who were, however, very few in number, discouraged any further efforts in that direction, and the territory passed into the hands of a private company.

And this is absolutely all that was known about it at the time of the purchase, or is known now, its very advocates in the Senate being compelled to admit that with the exception of the islands—themselves also unexplored—and its forbidding and almost inaccessible coast, the whole land was a terra incognita to civilized man, and nothing having since been done in the way of exploration except the alleged ascent of the Yukon by Lieutenant Ketchum, in 1867, as far as the British fort of that name, at the mouth of the Porcupine river, and about six hundred miles in a direct line from the coast, of which, however, we have no particulars. Why a treaty for the purchase should have been ratified under such circumstances, unless upon the principle of omne ignotum pro magnifico, which has entered so largely into the discussion here, is still a mystery, as will be the passage of this bill.

Upon this showing the laws of nature would seem to settle the question as to the agricultural capabilities of this comparatively unknown region, which may be characterized, I suppose, as the bucolic argument. To meet, however, the presumption arising from a latitude so high as to preclude all cultivation of the cereals, the honorable chairman takes refuge in the insular position of Sitka, in latitude 57°, which is just three degrees south of the continental mass of this territory, and over fourteen degrees south of its northern boundary, where he shows a mean annual temperature of forty-two degrees, or ten degrees above the freezing point, a climatic condition resulting from no extremes of cold or heat, but from a uniformity which is only achieved at the expense of almost incessant rains and mists, which render the harbor and all the adjacent coasts at times inaccessible, and agricultural pursuits impossible, even if there were level ground enough for that purpose in a region where, according to Sir George Simpson, enough could not be found even for the location of a fort.

A writer of an article in the Atlantic Monthly, of June, 1867, not unfavorable to the purchase, and evidently designed to impress the public mind with a high idea of its value, remarks that it rains at Sitka almost, if not quite, every day in the year. The table embodied in the report itself shows two hundred and fifty days of rain in the year, and about twenty-three in each of the summer months; while it is admitted that it does not follow that the residue are clear, that kind of weather prevailing most generally in January, and always under the influence of north winds. The same climatic influences would, of course, prevail along the immediate coast of the mainland just opposite, which, as well as the islands, is covered with a deep coating of moss always saturated with water, even to the mountain tops. Whether this condition of things is at all fitted for the growth or ripening or curing of any crop whatever, or reconcilable with farm culture of any description, even supposing the land to be arable, is a question that does not admit of controversy, and it is only surprising that any body should have the hardihood to assert it on the face of the facts shown by the report itself.

Leaving the insular position, however, for the continental one, we part with the rains only to encounter the frosts, and find a region underlaid with perpetual ice at a depth ranging from a few inches to five or six feet, with the surface thawed out in the most favorable positions for, perhaps, three or four months of the year. In latitude 55°, which is more than two degrees south of Sitka, Major Pope, who was connected with the telegraphic expedition, reports ground ice at the depth of six to eight feet, with a surface which freezes in winter to the depth of two feet. The lands which the Government is in such haste to survey for the purpose of meeting the expected rush of American settlers—the same described in the report as "the garden of Alaska," and the same spoken of by Teubenkoff in 1848, as quoted by Professor Davidson, as "surrounded by rocks and pine forests, mountains covered with eternal snow, enveloped in perpetual fog, or invisible with drizzling rains"—are, according to the authorities relied on, in the peninsula of Kenay, or between Cook's inlet and Prince William's sound, and from five to six degrees further north.

Within only one or two degrees of latitude, however, from this "garden" spot, according to observations made at the Russian post of Ikagmut, which is on the Yukon river, in latitude 61° 47', and about one hundred and fifty miles from the coast, the mean annual temperature is reported at 24° 57', which is more than 7° below the point of congelation, while mercury, which freezes at minus 40°, has been known to solidify in February and March, and the soil never thaws beyond the depth of seven inches! Further north the cold is, of course, proportionally intensified. At Fort Yukon, in latitude 64°, the mean annual temperature is 16°.

92, or more than 15° below the freezing point. From the line of the Yukon northward the whole region is admitted to be purely arctic, where the days are shortened far beyond even the demands of the eight-hour advocates, and the sun himself, the great fountain of light and heat, plunges below the horizon at the winter solstice, and leaves behind him nothing but a disastrous twilight, shedding its sepulchral gloom over boundless and trackless wastes of snow. What an attraction for an American farmer! Here the regent of day rides through our harvests at an angle approaching 16° from the zenith, and never descends below one of about 28° above the horizon; while there, even at Sitka, if he shows himself at all in the summer, as it is admitted that he very rarely does, it is only to shoot at a long inclination a sickly and refracted ray through a watery atmosphere.

I beg to say to the honorable chairman that he makes a great mistake if he supposes that the romances of newspaper correspondents, or the outgivings of mercenary editors, just now seized with a sudden zeal for the propagation of the Gospel and finding in that region a commanding station for evangelizing all eastern Asia, or even the ignorant and interested twaddle of a land commissioner, will be taken by sensible men as an answer to such facts as these, or can have any other effect than to make the world laugh, and taint and discredit the whole proceeding. Even a good thing may be overdone. A large faith may perhaps lean safely on the probable; but when the case overleaps that line, and approaches the boundaries of the impossible, it is not always prudent to presume too largely on the credulity of the people.

But the whole question is disposed of by the answer of the Russian Government itself to the grave inquiry—visum teneatis, amici?—as to its system of division and measurement of landed property in such a way as not only to put it forever at rest, but to make it absolutely amazing that anybody should have thought it worth while to attempt to mislead either the House or country upon this subject. I quote so much of that answer as refers to this subject. And first as to the islands:

"The native population of each separate island is so very insignificant that the inhabitants of any one could not meet with the slightest cause of collision of interests in the use of lands; in addition to this, the soil itself being perfectly barren, and unfit either for agricultural or grazing purposes, there was no reason why the natives should endeavor to extend the limits of their lands.

"There was even less ground for the enactment of any particular regulations in view of immigrant settlers. Who can ever have a mind to settle in that country, where permanent fogs and dampness of atmosphere and want of solar heat and light, leaving out of the question anything like agriculture, make it impossible to provide even a sufficient supply of hay for cattle, and where man, from want of bread, salt, and meat, to escape scurvy must constantly live upon fish, berries, shell-fish, sea-cabbages, and other products of the sea, soaking them profusely with the grease of sea beasts. The Aleutian islands may attract transient traders, but no permanent settlers; to inhabit them one must be an Aleute, and if it were not for the sea surrounding the islands this country, owing to its unfavorable climatic conditions and the sterility of its ground, would have never been inhabited at all."

Then as to the continent:

"From all what we said it clearly appears, that in this region no attempts were ever made, and no necessity ever occurred, to introduce any system of land-ownership; the country occupied by savages is too vast; they use to camp in certain fit places, generally marked by mountains, rivers, and streams, each having its name, but no fixed boundaries whatever, and their migrations are guided by wild instinct and unbounded will. All this region has neither past nor present, and it may be confidently said of the future that it is far and impenetrable. Every attempt of civilizing that country will stumble against unconquerable obstacles; the complete absence of local topography, the wild character of the savages, and no less wild character of nature; but, above all, the rigor and inconstancy of climate. To achieve any good results for the future of that country, by means of conquest and violence, would hardly be possible; to drive the savages further into the interior of the American continent, however difficult, would be possible; but this plan will be connected with irrecoverable money and material losses; the more so, that a civilized population will never be attracted to that country; there can be expected speculators, but no permanent settlers; there can be expected no civilized population, no permanent industry, but rather spoliators of the natives, and depredatory working out of the riches as well on the surface as in the womb of the earth. Such system can devastate, but not organize the country."

The next question, as to the resources of this region in timber, is sufficiently disposed of by what has been already said in relation to its agricultural capabilities. The Arctic flora, as well as its fauna, is too well defined among naturalists to make it worth while to plant within that region a giant vegetation which does not belong to it. A soil that is permanently underlaid with ice, with a surface frozen to an unknown depth and thawed out only for a little while in the summer to a depth of seven inches, is obviously even more unfitted for the growth of timber trees than it is for the cultivation of the cereals. The testimony is that the Aleutian islands are so barren as to be absolutely treeless, while the forests along the coasts that are nourished by the incessant rains are practically inaccessible. Dr. Kellogg, the botanist of the expedition sent out last year by the Government, remarks that—

"Unfortunately, this vast region of islands and continental coast is not bordered at the base of these lofty timbered ranges with sloping or level bottoms, but is gashed with precipitous and inaccessible gorges, the peaks being for the most part capped with snows, which, melting in summer, make every rockless footstep a sphagnum, miry morass."

And now as to the mineral resources of this region.

While it is admitted that there is nothing in the element of latitude or climate, to prevent the existence of beds of coal and mineral ores within the territory in question, there is no part of the case in which the invention of its advocates has been more largely and freely indulged. Of all these supposed discoveries a careful examination of the report itself will show, that not a single one has any foundation of fact to rest upon, or any other existence than in the faith or the imagination of the relator, or the inventor. It is all hearsay, and all apparently manufactured by the relators themselves for this particular market. Thus, on page 28, "There is said to be an unworked vein of coal, seven feet thick, and similar veins are reported to exist" at another point. Professor Davidson, who, with other scientific men, was sent out by this Government along with Captain Howard, in the revenue-cutter Lincoln, to make a reconnoissance of that whole region, reports that the specimens examined by him were merely lignite, thickly marked with iron pyrites, and that the coal actually discovered had been faithfully tried on the Russian steamers, and found so worthless as to make it necessary for them to get their supplies from Vancouver's Island, which is a British possession. All he can say is that "he is informed that at a certain place described by him, there is an unworked vein of seven feet, but that it has not been opened." Again, on the same page, "silver is represented to exist in several places." "An assay of gold from other parts of Alaska made at California, January 16, 1868, was reported to the Secretary of State by W. T. Ballou"—the same who reported a vein of pure anthracite of thirty feet in depth, and only wanted funds to develop much more astonishing facts—"to yield $13,000 per ton." "Miners made from two to seven dollars per day at the gold diggings in the Stekine river" without informing us, however, that this was in British territory. "Gold is reported to exist in the Kakmay river, at Cook's inlet, and at St. Nicholas." "Bismuth of a remarkably fine quality is reported by the Russians in the flanks of the Victoria mountains, and iron ore in the vicinity of Sitka," and "although no sufficient opportunity has been given the agents of the United States to verify the truth or falsehood of these reports, there is, scarcely a doubt that they will prove well founded." "There would seem to be no reason why the mineral wealth of this coast should be less than that of Japan." "At Ikagmut Zagoyskin saw fine, clear earth of different colors. These, he thought, contained lead." Professor Davidson says that magnetic ore is reported to exist on Pateshiskof Island, "but the hurried surveys made by Mr. Blake for the discovery of the ore were unsuccessful." "Captain Demidoff expressed the opinion to the correspondent of the New York Herald that in the interior of Alaska would be found the richest auriferous sands in the world." "Lieutenant Pease found a copper-bearing rock in Behring's sea." "On the way down the Yukon the natives pointed out a hill where coal was worked by them for their own use." Zagoyskin found indications of lead on the lower Yukon." A French traveler named Roche "is sure that gold might be found in all the rivers and valleys. He wrote thus fifteen years ago, and his predictions have already been partially realized. He positively declared that platinum, lead, silver, diamonds, and other minerals found in Siberia would be discovered in the mountains of Russian America." "In fact, he says that jet, kalium, petroleum, variegated marble, iron ore, &c., have been brought to light." "Many beds of bituminous coal have been discovered on the coast and in the Aleutian Islands. The Russian steamers have long taken coal from the mines of Kodiak, which can furnish it for future commerce for many years yet." The last of these statements is now absolutely disproved, as has been already shown, as are all the rest, by the report of Mr. Blake, the geologist of the expedition, who says "he found no coal of any value, neither precious or base metals of any kind. He was told of the existence of various metals at different times, but when sought where they are said to be they were not there."

And here is a fair specimen of the stuff—if I may be allowed the expression—with which the House has been regaled, as evidence of the existence of mineral riches in this territory. There was a class of alchemists in the middle ages who spent many a weary year in the search of the philosopher's stone, as there was another class of mere pretenders who profited largely by the credulity of simpler men who were weak enough to lend a believing ear to their glittering promises. I am not sure that the founder of a certain German colony in this country, within living memory, did not claim the power among his followers, of transmuting the rocks which underlaid his settlement into gold. But was there anything more extravagant in these pretensions than what we are called upon to witness in the way of evidence and prophecy here? Surely these things require no serious answer.

And now as to the fishes, which may be called, I suppose, the argumentum piscatorium.

It is not denied or doubted that they do abound, as in most high latitudes, upon the western coast of Russian America, as the fact that they constitute the principal support of the native population sufficiently attests. Is it proposed, however, to bring the American settler down to this Lenten entertainment? I have seen it somewhere stated—perhaps by as great an authority as Agassiz—that there is a large amount of brain power, in the shape of phosphorus, locked up within the scales of the finny tribes. Does the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGER,] who bids so high for this property, intend a colony from that unfailing fount of Democratic power, the Milesian element, which still cleaves with so much devotion to the claimed "successor of the fisherman," to inhabit a land where Lent may be made perpetual, and every day will be a fish day? Is it seriously proposed to educate a higher class of American voters, by converting them into ichthyophagi? Or is it the larger tenants of the ocean, the more gigantic game, from the whale, and seal, and walrus, down to the halibut and cod, of which it is intended to open the pursuit to the adventurous fishermen of the Atlantic coast, who are there already in a domain that is free to all? My venerable colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] who discourses as though he were a true brother of the angle himself, finds the foundations of this great Republic, like those of Venice and Genoa, among the fishermen. Beautiful as it shows above, like the fabled mermaid—

"Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne," it ends, according to him, as does the Alaska argument itself, in nothing but a fish at last. But the resources of the Atlantic are now, he says, exhausted. The Falkland Islands are now only a resting-place in our maritime career, and American liberty can no longer live, except by giving to its founders a wider range upon a vaster sea. Think of it, he exclaims—I do not quote his precise language—what a burning shame is it not to us that we have not a spot of earth in all that watery domain, on which to refit a mast or sail, or dry a net or fish?—forgetting, all the while, that we have the range of those seas without the leave of anybody; that the privilege of landing anywhere was just as readily attainable, if wanted, as that of hunting on the territory by the British; and above all, that according to the official report of Captain Howard, no fishing-bank has been discovered within the Russian latitudes! I do not propose, however, to cast a line into these muddy waters. If it were all true, as represented, there is ample room and verge enough for the industry of our people, without wasting our substance, or loading ourselves and our posterity with a perpetual incumbrance like this. Is it expected that our fishermen, like the disciples of old, will be able by another miracle, and a greater than the former, to extract from the jaws of the first "catch," not only the penny wherewithal to meet the demands of the tax-gatherer, but enough to pay these $10,000,000 in the money of the country, along with the additional annual and perpetual charge of several millions more, which this territory is to cost us?

I say nothing of the fur-bearing animals, which are known to be rapidly disappearing, and are, at all events, of so little consequence as not to deserve a place in the argument.

But, then, we are told by the honorable chairman that it is a contiguous territory; that it is "the germ of an inappreciable power;" that it is necessary for our defense, and for the preservation of our institutions and power; that it is the key of the Pacific; that it gives us the control of the Arctic coasts, and makes Behring's sea, and all beyond, essentially American; that by its hundred islands, which are but a stepping-stone to Asia, it brings us face to face with the ancient civilization of China; that the nations of the earth are looking upon it with greedy eyes; that Europe is destined to a terrible war, in which the first movement will be to get possession of this much-desidered land; that it makes us, in effect, the masters of the coast of British America, which is worthless without it; and that if we do not take advantage of the offer, it will fall inevitably into the possession of some hostile Power. All these are but the supplements to an argument upon the intrinsic value of the territory which is felt to require extraneous support. A few words, however, will suffice to show that they do not help the case.

The alleged contiguity, in the first place, which would have brought the case within the precedents, and was considered, no doubt, by the committee as a controlling argument, is a mistake—committed in apparent oblivion of the very recent controversy and settlement between Great Britain and the United States—of just 5° 40', or some four hundred miles, in latitude, which brings the territory about as near to our dominions as Russia itself is to France. But this is now answered by the suggestion, that it comes to the same thing, because if we could not get up from 49° to that point by negotiation, we can surely get down from the same point to 45°, by rendering the British possessions comparatively worthless, and squeezing her out entirely. This means war, if it means anything, as one of the first fruits of this acquisition; but that we can have as readily, and wage as successfully, without the disadvantage of an outlying possession, which could be seized at once by an enterprising enemy like Great Britain, if she considered it worth taking. How we are to be damaged now by its falling into the hands of the same Power which holds Vancouver Island already, or in what way it is necessary for our defense, or for the preservation of our institutions or power, that we should multiply our vulnerable points, has not been shown, and cannot be easily conjectured.

But then we are informed that it is the key of the Pacific! If the honorable chairman had asserted that it was the key to Behring's strait, and to the Arctic sea, over which it is supposed that it will give us the control—forgetting that Russia is still on the other side—as though we wanted a dragon there to guard his new Hesperides from other Powers, we could have understood him; but when he speaks of a region buried in mists and storms, away on the northern extremity of that great ocean, away out of the track of all its commerce, and visited only by an occasional whaler, I confess I am too dull to comprehend his meaning, as I am when he insists that it brings us face to face with the Celestial empire—which we face just now—by putting us away off on its flanks. Will the commerce of China ever take that route? Is it the greater proximity on which he relies? Does he think it is an easy leap to the old Continent? Behring and his crew were frozen to death in that passage. Where is there a port on the Asiatic shore in that high latitude which is approachable? Is it anywhere in Kamtschatka? Is it even in the Sea of Okhotsk? Or does he reckon upon this territory merely as an advanced post in that march to universal dominion with which we are now threatened? Does he propose to follow up this acquisition, by the bid of another $7,000,000 in gold for Kamtschatka, to run down the coast, engage for a province or two of China, contract for Japan, and squeeze Great Britain out of the Indian seas? My venerable colleague complains, as I have already remarked, that it is "a burning shame" that we have not a spot of ground in the wide Pacific to dry a fish, or a stick of timber to repair a shattered mast. Is it not equally a shame that we do not own a continent or an island in the Indian ocean?

But if we do not take this property some European Power will. And here the honorable gentleman takes up the role of the prophet, and informs us that there is, ere many days, to be a terrible war in Europe, in which this event will be sure to happen. Well, be it so. I should not grudge any of them the acquisition, but would rather wish them joy of it, if a region so forbidding could be a "thing of joy" to anybody. But what Power in Europe would desire it? What would any of them do with such an elephant if they had it, when even Russia herself, though clothed in furs, and with her sub-Arctic population, could not afford to keep it? I trust the American Congress is not to be frightened by such an argument as this, into the ratification of so poor a bargain. It is only of a piece with the kindred argument, so obviously borrowed from the auctioneer who puffs his wares, that we have twice before been silly enough to offer to buy this property, and that it has been twice as silly refused.

If there is anything in this part of the argument, it means that we are now about to abandon our traditional policy, and enter upon a scheme of universal dominion; to absorb all surrounding nationalities, and then to spread our wings for foreign flight, till "the whole boundless universe is ours." This is the spread-eagle argument. It has great attractions for the young. When I was a boy myself, if I may be allowed the egotism, I was tempted to indulge on a Fourth of July in an aerial excursion of the same sort, which has perhaps done more to keep my memory green among the boys than anything else that I have ever said or written. That, however, was only to the Western ocean, wherein the royal bird has long since dipped his wings. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] and my junior colleague, [Mr. MYERS,] alike buoyed up by the tempestuous ardor that always animates the young—

"Their airy caravans high over seas
Flying, and over lands, with mutual wing

have sped away under the convoy of the adventurous Chairman, above "the sea's tumultuous roar," over "Behring's rock," and even beyond the watery domain of the world's great ocean. Nay, even the Nestor of the Pennsylvania delegation, [Mr. STEVENS,] who has arrived by some new process at the philosophic conclusion that it is wise to emulate the greatness and the glory of imperial Rome by the same policy which rent her first in twain, and then gave over the dismembered fragments of the huge carcass to the fierce barbarians of the north, feeling the divine effatus, and kindling again, like the Phoenix, into new life under the inspiration of the clang with which his juniors spurn the ground, "his sail broad vans expands for flight," and lifts himself into the empyrean so far above his exemplars, as to take in at a glance, not only Alaska, but "all creation," with all its seas, and continents, and isles. Well, this is logical, as it is outspoken. He sees with the ken of a prophet, in the purchase of this desolate outlook, that "germ of inappreciable power" to which the honorable chairman so eloquently refers, because he sees in it the precedent, and in its volcanic peaks the starting point, in that grand march to universal empire, which, abandoning the pursuits of peace and happiness, is to give to our posterity a legacy of war, and prepare for the instruction of future generations another of those grand convulsions which have shattered the great empires of the earth into fragments. The last experiment of this sort upon the other hemisphere was checked disastrously among the snows of Russia, and brought the Cossacks of the Don to water their horses in the Seine.

I trust that the first step in our downward march is not to begin where that of another child of destiny came to an end. It is not so much the mere dross that this purchase is to cost us that disturbs me. It is not even the still heavier burden of governing an outlying possession such as this, at the expense of great corruption, and endless Indian wars. But we cannot afford to enter upon the new field to which we are now invited. It may suit a monarchical Government to hold remote dependencies, as Great Britain does. The genius of our institutions forbid us that privilege. We must associate them with ourselves, or change our Government. But we cannot grapple them to us by ties of fellowship, without a community of interest. Even the diversity that slavery produced had so far overcome the effect of juxtaposition itself, that nothing but this single fact could have saved this Union from destruction. How long will it be that the people even of our own race, upon the Atlantic and Pacific shores, will consider their interests the same? When they come to differ, what power is there here to hold the latter, with a population equal to that of the southern States, in case of a rupture? With the introduction of a foreign element, with the insane attempt to fuse down dissimilar and heterogeneous races in our national crucible, how long will it be till we shall find causes of quarrel that are irremediable, and coercion and reunion impossible? Settle the precedent that the American "Cæsar with a Senate at his heels" may pass beyond the boundaries of our own dominions, and beyond those of foreign Powers, to truck and traffic in provinces and kingdoms at his own mere will—accept the slavish doctrine that has been enunciated here, in the very House of the people, and there are no limits to his power, or our responsibility in this direction. If he can buy Russian America without our consent, he may purchase Siberia, and China, and Hindostan, and the boundaries of our Republic are determinable only by his will. If he may engage us for ten millions here he may engage us for a thousand millions for the same purpose elsewhere. The Queen of England cannot do these things in the face of the great principle that the control of the public purse belongs to the Commons. Shame on the Representative in a free Republic, who would abdicate his trust and his power over the public moneys, by laying them down at the feet of any Executive!

If these things can be done in a case of the first impression, where there is so little to tempt, where the subject of purchase is so notoriously worthless that it is impossible even to construct a respectable argument in its support, where there was no intelligible reason for the act, and the condition of the country absolutely forbade it, where the whole management of the affair was notoriously reckless and indecent, and so obviously intended to conclude the House, and where the Administration itself which conducted it, had so entirely lost the confidence of the country, it is impossible to imagine another case in which the same thing will not be repeated. Precedents such as these become laws for future cases. When the chairman of the committee is asked where he finds authority in the Constitution to purchase and annex foreign territory, he very coolly answers that he finds it in the policy of the nation. The rule of the statesman is obsta principiiis. The first lapse from virtue is always fatal. To suppose that its repetition can be restrained by a mere verbal protest, is to deal with the subject not like statesmen, but like children. I had hoped and believed that there was a special providence in the facts to which I have referred. If they, however, are not sufficient to save us in a House so strongly Republican, and in a financial condition so embarrassing as ours, then I can only say God save the country, for man has failed us again!

But then it is urged, in default of all other argument, that although the bargain was an improper one, and although Congress has the right to inquire into the expediency of making the necessary appropriations to carry into effect a treaty made by the President and Senate, and to refuse the money if it be found in conflict with the fundamental principles, purposes, and even interests of this Government, it would have the aspect of bad faith in the eyes of the world to assert that right after possession taken by the Executive, and would probably give offense to the emperor of all the Russias, who has testified his good-will to us by adhering to his treaty stipulations during our recent troubles, when the two leading and rival Powers of western Europe were violating theirs.

This is, perhaps, the poorest and most unworthy of all the arguments that have been employed to force this indefensible contract upon the nation. It was intended, of course, only for the weak and the cowardly. It could hardly have been expected to move anybody else. To say that it would be acting in bad faith to assert a right that the Constitution gives us, and which is essential to its own preservation, is to affirm that the Constitution is not to be our rule, and that fidelity to our oaths, and to the people who sent us here, is bad faith to somebody outside, whose feelings or wishes or interests are to be consulted at the expense of disloyalty to them, which, if any offense at all, is but a venial one. I do not so rate my obligations. My duties are to the people who sent me here, and not to the emperor of Russia; and I am a stranger to that code of political ethics which would compel me to prefer him to my country. Duty under the Constitution is but the correlative of right. If that authorizes me to inquire into the expediency of voting money, whether the object is within the scope of the treaty power, or whether it is in conflict with the principles, purposes, or interests of the Government, then it makes it my imperative duty to make the inquiry, and vote accordingly, and I cannot escape the responsibility by shifting the burden upon the shoulders of the President and Senate. Nor does the act of the President, done without my authority, amount either to a waiver or an estoppel. I may debar myself in equity from the assertion of a right which is my own. I may be estopped perhaps by the act of my own private agent, when he is acting within the scope of his authority. I know, as a lawyer, no principle that will give to the acts of a public one that sort of virtue or efficacy. Those who deal with him are bound to look to the letter of his authority. If the President has overstepped the line of his duty by prematurely asking and obtaining possession of the territory against all precedent and all decency, and for a fraudulent purpose, that is no fault of ours, if even the action of Congress itself could be taken as a waiver in any case. The emperor of Russia knew, or was bound to know, that the treaty was not perfected, and was not even a law to our courts, under the interpretation which the Constitution had already received from them. He could not but have known that the object was a fraudulent one. If he has assisted the President in his shameful device, when the purpose was so obviously to place the Government in a position where timid men might find an apology, and dishonest ones a pretext for ignoring a solemn duty, and where he was himself so largely interested in palming off on us at a great price a worthless and burdensome property, then he has placed himself, by the collusion, in the attitude of a particeps criminis, and so far from being allowed to profit by the joint fraud, has furnished a conclusive reason for the repudiation of the whole transaction, and made himself obnoxious to the very imputation of bad faith which is now threatened and apprehended here, by his so dealing with Congress and the people of the United States; and instead of ratifying the act, we should rather have censured him, and impeached the President and Secretary both.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Williams.

I do not intend to say that the emperor of Russia was personally consant of the fraudulent intention, or capable of doing what the present Administration would have no scruples about itself, while it would be a great stretch of charity, and no compliment to the shrewdness or tact of his ambassador here, to suppose that he could have been ignorant of the fact that the treaty was unpalatable to the nation, and that its execution must depend on the assent of Congress. But whether the emperor of Russia was informed or not, is a question only between his minister and himself.

But then it is insisted that he is a friend; that in our darkest hour he kept faith, if he did not sympathize with us, while the great Powers of England and France were contriving and conspiring for our destruction. Nay, it is even more than hinted here, that we owe our preservation to the fact that his fleet appeared at a critical time in our waters; and upon these considerations it is urged that it would be ungracious to offend him, and better to take the risk of the destruction of this Government, by a departure from its traditional policy, and even a violation of its Constitution, than to do anything to incur the displeasure of so great a monarch.

Well, I admit that the contrast between the conduct of the Czar, and that of the more enlightened nations of Western Europe, in observing his treaty stipulations with us, was well calculated to inspire a friendly feeling toward him on this side of the ocean, although I am not prepared to concede that he did any more than his duty, or that there was any risk of European interference here, unless it was such as was invited by the pusillanimous and unmanly tone of the instructions of our own Secretary of State to the nation's representatives abroad. I am rather surprised, however, that gentlemen claiming to be statesmen, should be ready to surrender, like so many sentimental, love-sick school girls, to demonstrations such as these. Do they really believe that the emperor of all the Russias, the absolute lord and master of more than sixty million slaves, is so smitten with affection for the democratic idea, that he is ready to abdicate his power, and republicanize his realms? Have they concluded that he has been sacrificing his own interests only for the sake of serving us? Is the article of good faith among nations so rare, that it is to be purchased and paid for at such a price—that we must allow ourselves to be cheated, and swindled, and revolutionized to testify our gratitude for its observance? Allow me to say to these unfledged statesmen, that there are no sentimental relations between nations. The Emperor of Russia has only consulted his own interests in cultivating friendly relations with the great Republic of the western hemisphere. He wants it as a counterpoise, as any one may see who understands the long settled policy of the European Powers in maintaining a just balance amongst themselves to his ambitious rivals of the West, for the same reasons precisely that France herself at an early day lent her assistance to detach us from the British empire, and build up a rival here to the boasted mistress of the seas. Without seaports himself, ever to make of his dominions a great maritime Power, he knows and feels that there is a Power here, that can hold his rivals both in check, and dispute with both, if necessary, the empire of the seas. As the leading territorial Power of the eastern hemisphere, with few, if any, points of contact or of conflict with us, and too remote and powerful to be jealous of us, or fearful of the contagion of our example, he has no objection to divide with us the empire of the world, so as to make America all republican, provided Europe and Asia can be made all Cossack. The statesman who supposes that he would either quarrel with us on a question like this, or hesitate to quarrel, or even assist in breaking up our Government, if he should find his interest in doing so, is but an apprentice in the business of diplomacy, and knows little of the motives that govern the conduct of nations. But he is no greater novice than the man who supposes that the refusal to ratify this one-sided bargain would be the occasion of quarrel, where it was the interest of both to cultivate the relations of peace. It would be a disappointment, possibly, to lose the opportunity of getting rid, at a high price, of a possession that would not have been parted with but for the reason that it was not only worthless, but an absolute incumbrance to the owner. But no, perhaps it would not be even that. After all the important discoveries made by the newspaper correspondents, and so liberally indorsed by the honorable chairman, of agricultural lands, and timber, and mines of the precious metals, the emperor who sold in blissful ignorance all these things, will, of course, be glad to get it all back again. If he should want to sell, however, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNCY,] who bids so largely for our votes, stands ready to offer him a large advance upon the property, which he may then secure, in absolute dominion, as a field for philosophical experiments in Democracy and ethnology. There is scope enough there for a genius like that of the Abbe Sieyes, or even for an ambition like that of Dr. Francia, the dictator of Paraguay. But should he make default upon his bond, and even the puff of the honorable chairman fail to bring the nations of the world as bidders at the great territorial auction, the emperor will be no worse off than he was before. It will only be turned over again, as heretofore, like the islands of the Arctic sea, to the solitude to which it is forever destined by its inhospitable shores, and its intemperate skies, as a habitation only for the Polar bear and the Arctic fox, the reindeer and the walrus.

But whether the emperor is disappointed or not, or what the world may think of it, is no question for an American statesman, and no reason for either squandering the money of the people, or imperiling the life of the nation. I can honor the sensibility that shrinks from the imputation of bad faith, while I cannot respect either the gross infidelity, or the unmanly fear, that would sacrifice the permanent welfare of a great nation to propitiate an absolute monarch, or even to avoid the hazard of a foreign war. What the world may think of it is of no consequence to us, so long as we enjoy the proud consciousness that we are faithful to our own Constitution, and the true interests of our own people. Thank God! we do not live on the opinion of the world, as it is clear that we cannot satisfy it. It holds to us no good-will, and accords to us no justice. When we tolerated slavery it reproached us with an affectation of pious horror for the crime. When slavery sought our national life, and we struggled to save ourselves by shaking it from our embrace, it conspired to preserve it, by dismembering and destroying us. There is one thing, however, which the diplomatic world will think, and that is, that we are great simpletons to hesitate about the repudiation of such a contract upon considerations such as these.

But the honorable chairman urges in the conclusion of his report, as one of the many curious reasons he has to offer in support of this purchase, the great fact that "it concentrated the power of Russia" and extends our own, so that we shall "soon together span the entire globe."

The emperor of Russia will, no doubt, feel infinitely obliged to the honorable chairman for such an unexpected testimonial of sympathy in his well-known schemes for universal dominion; and not the less, I suppose, in view of the fact, that as a member of the Republican Congress of America, he is not unwilling that we shall vote a subsidy in aid of the scheme, by paying the expenses of this menacing concentration out of our own Treasury. What the American people will say, however, to the contemplated partnership with the descendant of the spoiler of Poland, for the partition of the world between us, and how they will feel at the idea of being taxed so largely in order to the consolidation of such an overshadowing despotism, is another question. Should they be even persuaded, however, that it is a good thing for the cause of republicanism throughout the globe, to build up a colossal power, that shall shake down the constitutional monarchies of Europe, and make one man the autocrat and master of the half of it, yet as reasonable logicians they will not be unlikely to inquire of the honorable committee, how it is that while they propose to augment the power of Russia by concentration, they hope to strengthen our own by the very opposite process of extension and diffusion. If they see the advantage to her of abandoning a detached, outlying, and remote possession, as a source of weakness and not of strength, the people who sent them here, will very naturally desire to know how we are to be advantaged by assuming the ownership under the same objections, and why we should pay this imperial favorite for the privilege of relieving him from the burden, and committing the same admitted blunder in policy ourselves.

I pass over the telegraphic reasons that are assigned in favor of this acquisition, although they invite a criticism that would not be amiss if there were time to indulge in it; but there is one other argument that figures conspicuously in the general summary of the report, which is so eccentric and significant, and withal suggestive, as to challenge a special notice; and that is, that "it furnishes a basis for explorations and discovery in the Arctic regions." In the interests of science there is no objection, perhaps, to a little nautical adventure for the discovery of the great mysteries of nature, although it has not been usual to purchase continents for such purposes.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Arms to Southern States—Mr. Jones.

But what is the object here? Is it the advancement of science? No. The honorable chairman tells us that the mineral treasures of the earth have shifted their location from the tropics to the higher latitudes, and that the further north we travel the richer the deposits are. Is there not danger, then, that we may accomplish too much? If the gold of the Indies proved fatal to the power of Spain, while England was hardening her muscles and forging her thunderbolts out of her iron and coal, what have we not to fear from the possible discovery of the pole? If the theory of the honorable chairman is correct, the great mystery of the northern lights is already partially solved in the radiating power of some gigantic gem, doubtless a diamond or sapphire mountain, set in the bosom of an open sea, that flashes its long streamers of glory down the northern skies. Is it for this that he proposes to buy this territory, and set on foot another Argonautic expedition under the auspices of the enterprising Secretary, in search of that culminating point, that true ultima Thule, that jeweled pivot on which the axle of the world revolves? I deprecate any such discovery. With such a treasure-house we should cease to work, the Secretary would buy the terraqueous globe, and what would be, if possible, even a greater infliction, fill it with the wearisome platitudes of his endless correspondence.

But if the rocks, and icebergs, and volcanoes, and earthquakes of Alaska are worth ten millions of our money, as a basis for such an expedition on the western coast, how much more valuable are the glaciers of Greenland, and the geysers of Iceland in the Atlantic sea, as a starting-point on such a voyage! Why, then, not hurry to the king of Denmark with the offer of another chest of gold for these more advanced points d'appui, and particularly for that unexplored, undefined, mysterious, and therefore magnificent possession, that hugs our shores, and is the nursing mother of the icebergs, that send their frigid breaths into our New England homes? Is there not danger that some rival European Power will get ahead of us; or that in the great prospective war that is now looming up from the horizon of Europe, it may become the prey of some of those rival Powers that have been shut out by the learned chairman in his general allotment of the northern world? I hope the chairman will look to it that we are not anticipated here.

But the argument runs low, and thin, and weak, when it comes down to such feeble crutches as these, and I shall waste no further time in pursuing it. All I have to add now is the inquiry, what there is left to excuse this flagrant and dangerous departure from the past policy of this nation, and this wanton waste of the resources of a people already groaning under an accumulation of debt that tasks all the ingenuity of its legislators not only to provide for, but to make even endurable? When we acquired Louisiana and Florida we were without debt, and they were contiguous territories, that furnished a ready plea of State necessity in excuse for an admitted violation of the Constitution. Is there any State necessity here? There is no pretense of it. Have the people desired it? Not a sensible man among them had ever suggested it. The whole country exclaimed at once, when it was made known to it, against the ineffable folly, if not the wanton prodigality of the whole transaction. There is no man here, I think, who would have advised it. I doubt whether there are twenty in this House who would be willing to vote for it now, but for the single reason that the contract has been made.

But is that a sufficient one in view of the law and facts as they are now presented? Will it satisfy the people on whom this burden is to be imposed? When they come to see it in its true light, and to realize as they will, the utter worthlessness of the acquisition, upon which the unity and permanence of this Republic, and the peace and happiness of their posterity have been so deeply periled, it behooves those who propose to vote away their money for such an object to provide themselves with some better apology than has yet been offered. It is not by a vain and empty flourish of drums and trumpets about "manifest destiny," and the greatness and glory of the American Republic, that they can hope to drown the voice of popular complaint. Thinking people are not to be satisfied in that way. They will lament the success of such a measure as this, whether it be the result of recklessness or mistake, as a formidable symptom of national decline. If the masses do not sympathize with them, the omen will be still more formidable. It is in any case a victory to the most obnoxious of Executives over the House of the people, even greater than the results of his unsuccessful impeachment by the same body. That was perhaps the fault of the Senate. This will be our own.

Arms to Southern States.

REMARKS OF HON. A. H. JONES,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 25, 1868,

On the subject of supplying the reconstructed States with their quota of arms.

Mr. JONES, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, on the subject of supplying the reconstructed States with their quota of arms I do not think that my venerable colleague from North Carolina, [Mr. BOYDEN,] in his remarks the other day, treated the subject upon its merits.

I deny the allegation to the effect that it is proposed by any one to send arms to North Carolina with a view of arming the people against each other. No one ever thought of such a monstrosity. Every newspaper in the State, and in the whole South, will feast upon what has been said in this Hall in opposition to the State being furnished with her quota of the Government arms. The gentleman said: "If we need anything, in God's name send the Army of the United States there." This is the declaration of the only member of this House from North Carolina whose district gave a majority against the constitution under which we have reestablished civil government in the State. For the securing of his election he is indebted to that very class which declare that the whole plan of reconstruction is unconstitutional, null, and void; and who declare that they will have the old Constitution, which they fought four dreadful years to destroy, or wade through blood. Rebels in some of the counties of my district have said that the judges provided under the new constitution would not be allowed to hold the courts; yet it has been declared in this Hall that it is dangerous to send arms there to protect the civil authorities against these outlaws. It is not against the well disposed, whether of rebel or Union antecedents, that protection is needed, but for their protection against the lawless desperadoes who infest the country, and who are the suppliant tools of the defiant, unrepentant rebel leaders, who would seize every opportunity to set at defiance the law, and the first opportune moment to overthrow the newly established civil governments.

The constitution of North Carolina provides for organizing and arming the militia in order to "execute the laws, suppress riots or insurrections, and to repel invasion." Washington taught that a "free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined for the national security and the preservation of order." It is the duty of the executives of the respective States to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Governor Holden, in his inaugural, properly said:

"This duty would be performed promptly, fearlessly, and firmly by him, and unless Congress makes provision to supply the State from the over abundant supply of Government arms looking to this end, an additional tax will have to be levied and collected off of the people of the impoverished States of the South, in order to provide for self-protection."

Mr. Speaker, I deny the charge that arms are wanted to make war; but, on the contrary, to preserve the peace. If the disaffected intend to carry out their threats of revolution and war in order to undo all the work of reconstruction; if they intend to make war upon the friends of law and order—those who would sustain the General Government—they are more likely to do so when the loyal are unarmed than when in a state of defense and much more likely to succeed. Without the necessary means of self-protection in the absence of United States troops, I unhesitatingly give it as my opinion that in many sections of the reconstructed States the enforcement of civil law would prove worse than a farce. The idea that it is "dangerous" to furnish North Carolina with arms is a slander upon the Governor of the State, and also upon the Legislature, the controlling element of which is composed of men who are true to both State and national Governments.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES

PASSED AT THE

SECOND SESSION FORTIETH CONGRESS.

PUBLIC ACTS OF THE FORTIETH CONGRESS

OF THE

UNITED STATES,

Passed at the Second Session, which was begun and held at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday, the 2d day of December, A. D. 1867; was adjourned on Monday, the 27th day of July, A. D. 1868, to meet on Monday, the 21st day of September; met on said 21st day of September, and adjourned to meet on Friday, the 16th day of October; met on said 16th day of October, and adjourned to meet on Tuesday, the 10th day of November; met on said 10th day of November, 1868, and ended the same day.

ANDREW JOHNSON, President. BENJAMIN F. WADE, President of the Senate. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHAP. I.—An Act granting a certain Right of Way to the Hudson River West Shore Railroad Company.

APPROVED, December 14, 1867.

CHAP. II.—An Act to provide for Changing of Names of Persons in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Samuel Chase Barney, jr., of the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, authorized to change his name to Samuel Chase De Krafft, and that this act shall take effect from December first, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person being a resident of the District of Columbia, being desirous to have his or her name changed, may file a petition in the supreme court of the said District of Columbia, setting forth therein the reasons therefor, and also the name desired to be used; notice of the filing of such petition containing the substance and prayer thereof shall be published for three consecutive weeks in some newspaper in general circulation published in said District, prior to the hearing of said petition. The said supreme court, or the justice holding the civil term thereof, on proof of such notice, and upon such showing as may be deemed satisfactory, may change the name of such applicant according to the prayer of such petition.

APPROVED, December 20, 1867.

CHAP. III.—An Act to prevent Frauds in the Collection of the Tax on Distilled Spirits.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act no distilled spirits shall be withdrawn or removed from any warehouse for the purpose of transportation, redistillation, rectification, change of package, exportation, or for any other purpose whatever, until the full tax on such spirits shall have been duly paid to the collector of the proper district. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, January 11, 1868.

CHAP. V.—An Act to provide for the Exemption of Cotton from Internal Tax.

APPROVED, February 3, 1868.

CHAP. VI.—An act to Suspend further Reduction of the Currency.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency, by retiring or canceling United States notes, shall be, and is hereby, suspended; but nothing herein contained shall prevent the cancellation and destruction of mutilated United States notes, and the replacing of the same with notes of the same character and amount.

CHAP. IX.—An Act to facilitate the Collection of the Direct Tax in the State of Delaware.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the valuation enumerated in the assessment list for direct tax in the State of Delaware, completed April nineteenth, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, being the valuation of real estate as owned at or near the time of the completion of said assessment, is hereby declared and made a lawful assessment of the direct tax of seventy-four thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars and thirty-three and one third cents, apportioned to the State of Delaware by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, upon the valuation therein enumerated, with the same force and effect as if made with reference to the date mentioned in the thirteenth section of said act; and that all existing provisions of law for the collection of said direct tax in the loyal States, except as provided in the fifty-third section of said act shall be applicable to the collection of the tax therein assessed. The notification of the time and place where appeals would be received and determined relative to said assessment, given by the assessor immediately after said completion, shall be deemed a lawful notice, and all proceedings under said notice, and in general in relation to said assessment, are hereby made as valid and legal as they would have been had the assessment been valid from its commencement.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the time within which the assessor is required to deliver the assessment list to the collector shall be within twenty days from the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lien provided for by the thirty-third section shall be and remain in force during two years after the taxes assessed in accordance with the first section of this act shall become due and payable.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all necessary expenses in procuring copies of the State assessment lists and for advertising connected with the assessment and collection of the tax shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the accounts for such expenses being first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

APPROVED, February 21, 1868.

CHAP. X.—An Act to authorize the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company to construct and maintain a Bridge across the Mississippi river and establish a Post Route.

APPROVED, February 21, 1868.

CHAP. XI.—An Act in relation to Additional Bounty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person or persons entitled to the bounty provided by sections twelve and thirteen of the act making appropriations for the civil service, approved July twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall have died or shall die before receiving said bounty, it shall be paid to the heirs of the soldiers as designated in said act in the order therein named, and to none other.

APPROVED, February 21, 1868.

CHAP. XIII.—An Act for the Protection in certain cases of Persons making Disclosures as Parties, or testifying as Witnesses.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no answer or other pleading of any party, and no discovery or evidence obtained by means of any judicial proceeding from any party or witness in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against such party or witness, or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, or in any proceeding by or before any officer of the United States, in respect to any crime, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture by reason of any act or omission of such party or witness: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed by him in discovering or testifying as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from its passage, and shall apply to all pending proceedings, as well as to those hereafter instituted.

APPROVED, February 25, 1868.

CHAP. XV.—An Act to establish and declare the Railroad and Bridges of the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company, as hereafter constructed, a Post Road, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company is hereby authorized and empowered to construct, build, and maintain bridges over and across the navigable waters of the United States on the route of said railroad between New Orleans and Mobile, for the use of said company and the passage of its engines, cars, and trains of cars, passengers, mails, and merchandise thereon; and said railroad and its bridges aforesaid, when constructed, completed, and in use, in accordance with this act and the laws of the several States through whose territory the same shall pass, shall be deemed, recognized, and known as lawful structures and a post road, and are hereby declared as such: Provided, however, That the said company, in the construction of its bridges over and across the waters known as the East Pascagoula river, and the Bay of Biloxi, [and] the Bay of St. Louis, shall construct and maintain draw-bridges in the channels thereof, which, when open, shall give a clear space for the passage of vessels of not less than eighty feet in the channels of the East Pascagoula, and of the Bay of Biloxi, and of the Bay of St. Louis, and of not less than one hundred feet in the channel of the Great Rigole; and said company shall at all times open the said draw-bridges, and shall provide reasonable and necessary facilities for the passage of all vessels requiring the same, except during and for ten minutes prior to and after the time of the passage of the mail and passenger trains of said company.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the right to alter or amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said rivers, growing out of the construction of said bridges, is hereby expressly reserved.

APPROVED, March 2, 1868.

CHAP. XVI.—An Act extending the Time for the Completion of the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time for completing a line of railroad from Dubuque to Sioux City, in the State of Iowa, for the construction of which lands were granted in alternate sections to said State by act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, be, and the same is, extended until the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, subject to the reverter mentioned in said act at the expiration of the time herein limited: Provided, [That] said road shall be constructed on the most practical route by way of Webster City and Fort Dodge to Sioux City, which route shall be at all points within the limits of said land grant, and the same shall be completed to Fort Dodge on or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, and thereafter at the rate of not less than forty miles each year; and the said road shall be constructed, operated, and maintained as one continuous and unbroken line of road from Dubuque to Sioux City; and no lands shall be disposed of, or patented, or certified for said purposes more than forty miles in advance of the point to which said road may be constructed from time to time.

APPROVED, March 2, 1868.

CHAP. XVII.—An Act in relation to Islands in the Great Miami River.

APPROVED, March 2, 1868.

CHAP. XIX.—An Act authorizing the Sale of an unoccupied Military Site at Waterford, Pennsylvania.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to sell to the highest and best bidder the military site of three acres of land at Waterford, Erie county, Pennsylvania, belonging to the United States, and pay the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States.

APPROVED, March 4, 1868.

CHAP. XX.—An Act restoring Lands to Market along the Line of the Pacific Railroads and Branches.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That nothing in the act approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof, shall be held to authorize the withdrawal or exclusion from settlement and entry, under the provisions of the preëmption or homestead laws, the even numbered sections along the routes of the several roads therein mentioned which have been or may be hereafter located: Provided, That such sections shall be rated at two dollars and fifty cents per acre, and subject only to entry under those laws; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to homestead settlement, preëmption, or entry, according to existing laws, all the even-numbered sections of land belonging to the Government, and now withdrawn from market, on both sides of the Pacific railroad and branches, wherever said road and branches have been definitely located.

APPROVED, March 6, 1868.

CHAP. XXI.—An Act for the Relief of Settlers on the late Sioux Indian Reservation in the State of Minnesota.

APPROVED, March 6, 1868.

CHAP. XXII.—An Act in relation to the Promulgation of the Laws of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to furnish the Congressional Printer with a correct copy of every act and joint resolution as soon as possible after its approval by the President of the United States, or after it shall have become a law in accordance with the Constitution without such approval. And so much of section seven of the act entitled "An act to expedite and regulate the printing of the public documents, and for other purposes," approved June twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, as requires the Secretary of the Senate to furnish such copy, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Congressional Printer, on receipt of the copy provided for in the foregoing section, shall in every case immediately cause an accurate printed copy of the act or resolution, as it shall have been furnished to him, to be prepared and sent in duplicate to the Secretary of State for revision, and on return of one of the revised duplicates the Congressional Printer shall at once have the marked corrections made, should there be any, and cause to be printed and sent to the Department of State fifty copies, and also cause to be printed separately the usual number for the use of the two Houses of Congress: Provided, That on request of the Secretary of State the Congressional Printer shall furnish to the Department of State any additional number of copies of any act or resolution, not exceeding five hundred copies.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to the Congressional Printer, at the beginning of each session of Congress, and thereafter when necessary, a list of all newspapers authorized by law to publish the laws of the United States, with their respective post offices, so far as the same shall have been communicated to him by the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, on the printing of each act or resolution, excepting those which are of a private character, and which shall be so designated by the Secretary of State, to transmit a copy thereof to each of the editors of such newspapers for prompt publication; and the number of copies of the public acts and resolutions requisite for this purpose are hereby authorized and required to be printed; and all letters and documents to and from the Congressional Printer, relating to the duties and business of his office, shall be transmitted by mail, free of postage, under such regulations as may be established by the Postmaster General.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of this act which apply to public acts and resolutions shall in like manner apply to treaties between the Government of the United States and foreign Governments, after they shall have been duly ratified and proclaimed by the President of the United States; and shall also apply to postal conventions made between the Postmaster General, by and with [the] advice and consent of the President, on the part of the United States, and equivalent officers of foreign Governments on the part of their respective countries, under the authority of the second section of the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March three, eighteen hundred and fifty-one: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to transmit a copy of each of said conventions to the Secretary of State, for this purpose, and that the printed copy of said conventions shall be revised by the Post Office Department.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws requiring the Secretary of State to send the laws first directly to newspapers for publication, as well as all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 9, 1868.

CHAP. XXIV.—An Act for the temporary Relief of Destitute People in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the temporary relief of the destitute population in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands: Provided, That as far as practical

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States who shall, after the passage of this act, accept or hold any appointment in the diplomatic or consular service of the Government, shall be considered as having resigned his said office, and the place held by him in the military or naval service shall be deemed and taken to be vacant, and shall be filled in the same manner as if the said officer had resigned the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no diplomatic or consular officer shall receive salary for the time during which he may be absent from his post by leave or otherwise, if such absence shall exceed sixty days in any one year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, March 30, 1868.

CHAP. XLI.—An Act to exempt certain Manufactures from Internal Tax, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That sections ninety-four and ninety-five of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory of said sections, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, except only so much of the said sections and amendments thereto as relates to the taxes imposed thereby on gas made of coal wholly or in part, or of any other material; on illuminating, lubricating, or other mineral oils or articles the products of the distillation, redistillation, or refining of crude petroleum, or of a single distillation of coal, shale, peat, asphaltum, or other bituminous substances, on wines therein described, and on snuff and all the other manufactures of tobacco, including cigarettes, cigars, and cheroots: Provided, That the products of petroleum and bituminous substances hereinbefore mentioned, except illuminating gas, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be taxed at one half the rates fixed by the said section ninety-four.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to repeal or interfere with any law, regulation, or provision for the assessment or collection of any tax which, under existing laws, may accrue before the first day of April, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. And nothing herein contained shall be construed as a repeal of any tax upon machinery or other articles which have been or may be delivered on contracts made with the United States prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That after the first day of June next, no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence in writing, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the first day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the passage of this act, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the first day of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture by hand or machinery any goods, wares, or merchandise, (breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber excepted,) not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade-mark thereon any articles or compound not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed five thousand dollars, shall pay for every additional thousand dollars in excess of five thousand dollars, two dollars, and the amount of sales in excess of the rate of five thousand dollars per annum shall be returned quarterly yearly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on the excess of five thousand dollars shall be assessed by the assessor and paid quarterly yearly in the months of January, April, July, and October of each year, as other taxes are assessed and paid. And the first assessment herein provided for shall be made in the month of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, for the three months then next preceding.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller who shall defraud or attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than three years.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do, or omit to do, any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report, in writing, such knowledge or information to his next superior officer, and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than three years.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no compromise, or discontinuance, or nolle prosequi of any prosecution under this act shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General.

APPROVED, March 31, 1868.

CHAP. XLIII.—An Act making Appropriations for the Expenses of the Trial of the Impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other Contingent Expenses of the Senate for the year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, and other contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight:

CHAP. XLVIII.—An Act to extend the Charter of Washington City, also to regulate the Selection of Officers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May seventeenth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, and the several amendments thereof now in force, are hereby continued in force for the term of one year from the date hereof, or until Congress shall by law determine otherwise.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the board of aldermen, and the board of common council thereof, to assemble in joint convention at the City Hall in said city on the first Tuesday of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and proceed to select by ballot all officers whose appointments, upon the nomination of the mayor, are now authorized by the charter, or by any law of the United States, or act or ordinance of said city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby, who shall hold their offices respectively for one year, and until a successor is appointed; and on the same day of the month in each year thereafter the joint convention shall proceed to a new selection: Provided, That no person shall be regarded as incompetent to hold any of said offices, or be disqualified therefor, who is a qualified elector in said District.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in all meetings of the mayor of the city of Washington and of the boards of aldermen and common council for the purposes mentioned in the second section of this act, the mayor or the president of either of said boards shall preside, and the secretaries of said boards shall act as tellers, and keep a record of the proceedings, and the mayor, or any member of either of said boards, may nominate one or more persons for the offices required to be filled, and the person having the highest number of votes shall be publicly declared selected, and a certificate of his election shall within five days be made out and be signed by the presiding officer and secretaries, and be transmitted to the person selected, who shall within ten days thereafter enter on the discharge of the duties of his office, which shall be immediately vacated by any person then holding the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all questions arising in the joint convention authorized by this act shall be determined by a majority of the votes of the members thereof present at any of its meetings, and it shall have power to adjourn from time to time until all the duties imposed upon it shall be completed, and to require of the persons selected for any office such security as may be deemed necessary. And in the event of any vacancy from disability, death, or resignation, it shall be the duty of the mayor to call a meeting of the joint convention to select a successor for the unexpired term of service.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when the mayor, the board of aldermen, and the common council shall be assembled in joint convention, as provided for in this act, they shall, by a majority vote, designate a bank in which the various moneys of the city of Washington shall be deposited, and they shall make such regulations in relation to the mode in which such funds shall be kept and paid out as shall be deemed advisable for the interests of the city; and within five days after such designation a certificate of the bank selected shall be made out and placed in the hands of the president or cashier thereof, and thereafter it shall not be lawful to retain or deposit the funds of the city, or any part thereof, in any other bank or place, unless by order of the board.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed January eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require electors in the city of Washington to reside in the ward or election precinct in which they shall offer to vote fifteen days prior to the day of any election, instead of three months: Provided, That said section shall not be construed as conferring the elective franchise in said city on non-commissioned officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines in the regular service of the United States, stationed or on duty in said city, except such as may have become actual residents with their families in said city for one year previous to any election: Provided further, That no person claiming to be a naturalized citizen shall be registered as an elector, nor shall the name of any such person be retained on the list of voters, without the production of his naturalization papers or duly certified copies thereof, or satisfactory proof of the loss of the same; and for the purpose of correcting said list as regards the aforesaid classes of persons, and in all other respects, the judges of election shall meet in some proper place in said city between the hours of nine o'clock a. m. and seven o'clock p. m., on three days instead of two days, as now required: Provided further, That all the original lists of voters, both before and after their correction, shall remain in the custody of the member of the board of judges first named in their appointment by the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and, in the event of his removal or resignation, in the custody of his regularly-appointed successor, except when being copied for publication and for the use of the commissioners of elections, and said original lists shall at all times be open for the use and inspection of either of said judges: Provided further, That no property qualification shall be required for any of the officers of said city, and that three days prior to any election each board of commissioners of election shall appoint two clerks to assist them in registering the names of voters in their respective election precincts, and in making returns of the elections, who shall be sworn before the clerk of the supreme court of said District truly and faithfully to perform their duties, and for any misconduct in office be subject to the same penalties to which said commissioners are now subject: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the judges of election to make any regulations and give any notice which may be proper or necessary to carry out any of the provisions of this section.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all acts and ordinances, or parts thereof, or parts of the charter of the city of Washington inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, June 8, 1868.

CHAP. LV.—An Act to further provide for giving effect to the various Grants of Public Lands to the State of Nevada.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Nevada is authorized to select the alternate even-numbered sections within the limits of any railroad grant in said State, in satisfaction, in whole or in part, of the several grants made in the following acts of Congress, to wit: the act organizing the Territory of Nevada, passed March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-one; the act admitting the State of Nevada into the Union, passed March twenty-one, eighteen hundred and sixty-four; and the act concerning certain lands granted to Nevada, passed July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six: Provided, That this privilege shall not extend to lands upon which there may be rightful claims under the preëemption and homestead laws: And provided, That if lands be selected, the minimum price of which is two dollars and fifty cents per acre, each acre so selected shall be taken by the State in satisfaction of two acres, the minimum price of which is one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: And provided further, That the lands granted in the eighth and ninth sections of the said act admitting Nevada into the Union shall be selected within four years from the passage of this act, and the period for the selection of said lands is hereby so extended.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lands known and designated for the establishment of an agricultural college by the act of July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and the acts amendatory thereto, shall be selected in the same manner and of the same character of lands as may be selected in satisfaction of any other grants referred to in the first section of this act. But this act shall not authorize the selection of lands valuable for mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, or copper.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the county of Esmeralda, in the State of Nevada, and the counties of Mono and Inyo, in the State of California, are hereby created a land district; and the land office for such district shall be located at Aurora, in Esmeralda county; and the President shall be authorized hereafter, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to adjust the boundaries of any and all of the land districts in said State, and change the location of the land office from time to time, when the same shall be expedient.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands granted to the State of California for the establishment of an agricultural college by the act of July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and acts amendatory thereto, may be selected by said State from any lands within said State subject to preëemption and sale: Provided, That this privilege shall not extend to lands upon which there may be rightful claims under the preëemption and homestead laws, nor to mineral lands: And provided further, That if lands be selected as aforesaid, the minimum price of which is two dollars and fifty cents per acre, each acre so selected shall be taken by the State in satisfaction of two acres, the minimum price of which is one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: And provided further, That such selections shall be made in every other respect subject to the conditions, restrictions, and limitations contained in the acts hereby modified.

APPROVED, June 8, 1868.

CHAP. LXX.—An Act to Admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to Representation in Congress.

Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican, and have adopted said constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the Legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, upon the following fundamental conditions: that the constitutions of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters; and the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State by solemn public act shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the day fixed for the first meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution or ordinance thereof shall have passed or have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the period fixed, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect, unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall, by its Legislature, duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia when it shall in addition give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same; and thereupon the officers of each State duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or under any State, by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment; and it is hereby made the duty of the President within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the Legislature of either of said States to issue a proclamation announcing that fact.

CHAP. LXXI.—An Act to provide for Appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed on behalf of the United States from all the final judgments of the said Court of Claims adverse to the United States, whether such judgments shall have been rendered by virtue of the general or any special power or jurisdiction of said court under the limitations now provided by law for other cases of appeal from said court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said Court of Claims, at any time while any suit or claim is pending before or on appeal from said court, or within two years next after the final disposition of any such suit or claim, may, on motion on behalf of the United States, grant a new trial in any such suit or claim and stay the payment of any judgment therein, upon such evidence (although the same may be cumulative or other) as shall reasonably satisfy said court that any fraud, wrong, or injustice in the premises has been done to the United States; but until an order is made staying the payment of a judgment, the same shall be payable and paid as now provided by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be material in any suit or claim before any court to ascertain whether any person did or did not give any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, the claimant or party asserting the loyalty of any such person to the United States during such rebellion shall be required to prove affirmatively that such person did, during said rebellion, consistently adhere to the United States, and did give no aid or comfort to persons engaged in said rebellion; and the voluntary residence of any such person in any place where, at any time during such residence, the rebel force or organization held sway, shall be prima facie evidence that such person did give aid and comfort to said rebellion and to the persons engaged therein.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no plaintiff or claimant, or any person from or through whom any such plaintiff or claimant derives his alleged title, claim, or right against the United States, or any person interested in any such title, claim, or right, shall be a competent witness in the Court of Claims in supporting any such title, claim, or right, and no testimony given by such plaintiff, claimant, or person shall be used: Provided, That the United States shall, if they see cause, have the right to examine such plaintiff, claimant, or person as a witness under the regulations and with the privileges provided in section eight of the act passed March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and fifty-five.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, the Attorney General of the United States for the time being shall, with his assistants, attend to the prosecution and defense of all matters and suits in the Court of Claims on behalf of the United States. There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two Assistant Attorneys General, who shall hold their offices for four years respectively, unless sooner lawfully removed, and whose salaries shall be four thousand dollars each per year, payable quarterly, and who shall be in lieu of the solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of the Assistant Attorney General now provided for by law; and the existing offices of solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of Assistant Attorney General, are hereby abolished from and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. The Attorney General shall have power to appoint two additional clerks of the fourth class, and one clerk, at a salary not exceeding two thousand dollars, in his office.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said Attorney General and his assistants, in all cases brought against the United States in said Court of Claims founded upon any contract, agreement, or transaction with any executive Department, or any bureau, officer, or agent of such Department, or where the matter or thing on which the claim is based shall have been passed upon and decided by any Department, bureau, or officer intrusted by law or Department regulations with the settlement and adjustment of such claims, demands, or accounts, to transmit to said Department, bureau, or officer, as aforesaid, a printed copy of the petition filed by the claimant in such case, with a request that the said Department, bureau, or officer to whom the same shall be so transmitted as aforesaid, will furnish to said Attorney General all facts, circumstances, and evidence touching said claim as is or may be in the possession or knowledge of the said Department, bureau, or officer; and it shall be the duty of the said Department, bureau, or officer to whom such petition may be transmitted and such request preferred as aforesaid, without delay, and within a reasonable time, to furnish said Attorney General with a full statement of all the facts, information, and proofs which are or may be within the knowledge or in the possession of said Department, bureau, or officer, relating to the claim aforesaid. Such statement shall also contain a reference to or description of all official documents or papers, if any, as may or do furnish proof of facts referred to in said statement, or that may be necessary and proper for the defense of the United States against the said claim, together with the Department, office, or place where the same is kept or may be procured. And if the said claim shall have been passed upon and decided by the said Department, bureau, or officer, the statement or answer to be transmitted to said Attorney General, as hereinbefore provided, shall succinctly state the reasons and principles upon which such decision shall have been based. In all cases where such decision shall have been made upon any act of Congress, or upon any section or clause of such act, the same shall be cited specifically. And if any previous interpretation or construction shall have been given to such act, section, or clause by the said Department or bureau transmitting such statement, the same shall be set forth succinctly in said statement, and a copy of the opinion filed, if any, shall be annexed to such statement and transmitted with the same to the Attorney General aforesaid. And where any decision in the case shall have been based upon any regulation of an executive Department, or where such regulation shall or may, in the opinion of the Department, bureau, or officer transmitting such statement, have any bearing upon the claim in suit, the same shall be distinctly referred to and quoted in extenso in the statement transmitted to said Attorney General: Provided, however, That where there shall be pending in said court more than one case, or a class of cases, the defense to which shall rest upon the same facts, circumstances, and proofs, the said Department, bureau, or officer shall only be required to certify and transmit one statement of the same, and such statement shall be held to apply to all such classes of cases as if made out, certified, and transmitted in each case respectively.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the head of any executive Department, whenever any claim is made upon said Department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive Department in the adjustment of a class of cases, without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, to cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant. And the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount, or class described or limited in this section to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents, and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said Court of Claims, for trial and adjudication: Provided, however, That no case shall be referred by any head of a Department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases to which, by reason of the subject-matter and character, the said Court of Claims might, under existing laws, take jurisdiction on such voluntary action of the claimant. And all the cases mentioned in this section which shall be transmitted by the head of any executive Department, or upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations; and appeals from the final judgments or decrees of said court therein to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed in the manner now provided by law. The amount of the final judgments or decrees in such cases so transmitted to said court, where rendered in favor of the claimants, shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same, if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists, the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person shall file or prosecute any claim or suit in the Court of Claims, or an appeal therefrom, for or in respect to which he or any assignee of his shall have commenced and has pending any suit or process in any other court against any officer or person who, at the time of the cause of action alleged in such suit or process arose, was in respect thereto acting or professing to act, mediately or immediately, under the authority of the United States, unless such suit or process, if now pending in such other court, shall be withdrawn or dismissed within thirty days after the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the clerk of the said Court of Claims to transmit to Congress, at the commencement of every December session, a full and complete statement of all the judgments rendered by the said court for the previous year, stating the amounts thereof and the parties in whose favor rendered, together with a brief synopsis of the nature of the claims upon which said judgments have been rendered.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of any act incompatible herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXII.—An Act constituting Eight Hours a Day's Work for all Laborers, Workmen, and Mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States: and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

CHAP. LXXIII.—An Act for the Relief of certain Exporters of Rum.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of January eleventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, entitled "An act to prevent frauds in the collection of tax on distilled spirits," be so construed as to permit rum, which at the date of the passage of said act was already distilled or redistilled and intended for export and actually contracted for to be delivered for exportation, to be withdrawn, removed, and exported from the United States under such transportation and export bonds and regulations as were required therefor immediately prior to the passage of said act, and as shall be provided for hereafter: Provided, That all such spirits shall be actually exported within sixty days from the passage of this act; and that before any such exportation shall be permitted proof in writing shall be furnished by sworn evidence, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that such rum was in fact at the date mentioned intended for export and distilled or redistilled for that purpose or actually contracted for to be so exported. And upon failure to so export the same within said sixty days, the tax thereon shall become due and payable, and the bonds given for the transportation and export thereof shall be forfeited and collected, as in case of such bonds not canceled according to law.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXIV.—An Act to reestablish the Boundaries of the Collection Districts of Michigan and Michilimackinac, and to change the names of the Collection Districts of Michilimackinac and Port Huron.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the collection district of Michigan shall be extended so as to embrace all the territory and waters of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and south of the latitudinal line dividing townships number forty-three from townships number forty-four, north of the base line of said State, excluding the territory bordering Green Bay and including the Island of Bois Blanc.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collection district of Michilimackinac shall hereafter be called the district of Superior, and shall embrace all that part of the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan lying east of the principal meridian, all the islands in, and bordering upon, the Saint Marie river, and all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and north of the latitudinal line dividing townships number forty-three from townships number forty-four, north of the base line of the said State, including the territory in said State bordering Green Bay, together with all the islands, waters, and shores of Lake Superior and the adjacent territory unto the headwaters of all the rivers and streams tributary thereto and within the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the collection district of Port Huron, in the State of Michigan, shall hereafter be called the district of Huron.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXV.—An Act to extend the Boundaries of the Collection District of Philadelphia so as to include the whole consolidated City of Philadelphia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the port of entry and delivery of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is hereby extended so as to include within its boundaries the whole consolidated city of Philadelphia.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXVI.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide for carrying the Mails from the United States to Foreign Ports, and for other purposes," approved March twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

CHAP. LXXVII.—An Act relative to filing Reports of Railroad Companies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the reports required to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the first day of July of each year, by the corporations created by or entitled to subsidies under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, shall hereafter be made to the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the first day of October of each year. Said reports shall furnish full and specific information upon the several points mentioned in the twentieth section of the said act of eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and shall be verified as therein prescribed, and on failure to make the same as herein required, the issue of bonds or patents to the company in default shall be suspended until the requirements of this act shall be complied with by such company. And the reports hitherto made to the Secretary of the Treasury under the said act of July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall be transferred and delivered by him to the Secretary of the Interior to be filed by him.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the corporations created by the provisions of the acts of Congress approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and July twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and known as the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, shall make reports to the Secretary of the Interior on or before the first of October of each year, as are required to be made by the Union Pacific railroad and branches, under the provisions of the first section of this act, and on failure so to do, shall be subject to the like suspension.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the reports required from the commissioners appointed to examine and report in relation to the road of any of the corporations whereto reference is made in this act, shall be addressed to and filed in the Department of the Interior; and all such reports heretofore made shall be transferred to and filed in said Department of the Interior; and so much of any and all acts as requires any reports from such companies, or any officers thereof, to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the eight subjects referred to in section twenty of the act of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, to be reported upon, there shall also be furnished annually to the Secretary of the Interior all reports of engineers, superintendents, or other officers who make annual reports to any of said railroad companies.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXVIII.—An Act appropriating Money to sustain the Indian Commission, and carry out Treaties made thereby.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXIX.—An Act to change the Times of holding the District and Circuit Courts of the United States in the several Districts in the State of Tennessee.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXX.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act granting Lands to aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from the Central Pacific Railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon."

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXXI.—An Act relating to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of a vacancy in the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or of his inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve upon the associate justice of said court whose commission is senior in time, until such inability shall be removed or another appointment shall be duly made and the person so appointed shall be duly qualified, and this act shall apply to every person succeeding to the office of Chief Justice pursuant to its provisions.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. LXXXII.—An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to Change the Names of certain Vessels.

APPROVED, June 25, 1868.

CHAP. CXVII.—An Act relating to Contested Elections in the City of Washington, District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any person has received or shall hereafter receive a certificate from the register of the city of Washington, based upon satisfactory evidence furnished by the commissioners of election, notifying him of his election to any elective office of said city, the person receiving such notification shall be entitled to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office, and the certificate of the register shall be prima facie evidence of his election to, and right to discharge the duties of, said office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall hinder or obstruct a person holding the certificate of election mentioned in the foregoing section from entering upon or discharging the duties of such office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any judge thereof, shall have jurisdiction to enforce, by mandamus, or otherwise, the right of any person holding the certificate mentioned in the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person who claims, or shall hereafter claim, to be elected to any elective office in said city, may commence proceedings before the said supreme court of the District of Columbia, by petition setting forth the facts upon which he relies, and shall serve a copy on the incumbent or person who has received the certificate of election; and the person so served shall make answer to said petition within five days; and said court shall thereupon try the rights of the parties to said office in a summary manner; and for that purpose a special session shall be called and held whenever necessary for the purposes of such trial; and the decision of said court in any case so brought before it shall be final and conclusive. And when the legal organization of the board of aldermen or board of common council shall be delayed on account of any contest in relation to the election of any member of either of said boards, the mayor of said city is hereby authorized to make temporary appointments of all subordinate officers whose appointment or election is authorized

Laws of the United States.

CHAP. CXVIII.—An Act for holding Terms of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois at the City of Cairo, in said State.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in addition to the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, now required by law to be held at the city of Springfield, terms of said court shall hereafter be held at the city of Cairo, in said State, commencing on the first Mondays of March and October in each year.

APPROVED, July 3, 1868.

CHAP. CXXXI.—An Act confirming the Title to a Tract of Land in Burlington, Iowa.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all of the title of the United States in and to a certain tract of land in the city of Burlington, Des Moines county, in the State of Iowa, described as being west of lot number nine hundred and seventy-eight in said city, south of Valley street, west of Boundary street, and north of Market street, and which was originally reserved from sale by the United States and dedicated to public burial purposes, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to and vested in the "Independent School District" of said city, to be forever dedicated to and used by said school district for public school purposes, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

APPROVED, July 4, 1868.

CHAP. CXXXIV.—An Act to authorize the Construction of a Bridge over the Black river, in Lorain county, Ohio.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the county commissioners of the county of Lorain and State of Ohio to build a bridge across the Black river near the village of Black River, in said county, at the point where the county road leading east from said village crosses said stream: Provided, That there shall be placed in said bridge a draw of not less than one hundred and forty feet in width, with a center abutment not to exceed twenty-five feet wide and ten feet above the water-line, leaving a passage on each side of the abutment of not less than fifty-seven feet in width, and so constructed as not to impede the navigation of said river, and allow the easy passage of vessels through said bridge.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the right to alter or amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved.

APPROVED, July 6, 1868.

CHAP. CXXXV.—An Act to continue the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and the act entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend 'An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees,' and for other purposes," passed on the sixteenth day of July, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall continue in force for the term of one year from and after the sixteenth of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, excepting so far as the same shall be herein modified. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to reestablish said bureau where the same has been wholly or in part discontinued: Provided, [That] he shall be satisfied that the personal safety of freedmen shall require it.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to discontinue the operations of the bureau in any State whenever such State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations with the Government of the United States, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States, unless, upon advising with the Commissioner of the bureau, and upon full consideration of the condition of freedmen's affairs in such State, the Secretary of War shall be of opinion that the further continuance of the bureau shall be necessary: Provided, however, That the educational division of said bureau shall not be affected, or in any way interfered with, until such State shall have made suitable provision for the education of the children of freedmen within said State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That unexpended balances in the hands of the Commissioner, not required otherwise for the due execution of the law, may be, in the discretion of the Commissioner, applied for the education of freedmen and refugees, subject to the provisions of laws applicable thereto.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That officers of the Veteran Reserve corps or of the volunteer service, now on duty in the Freedmen's Bureau as assistant commissioners, agents, medical officers, or in other capacities, who have been or may be mustered out of service, may be retained by the Commissioner, when the same shall be required for the proper execution of the laws, as officers of the bureau, upon such duty and with the same pay, compensation, and all allowances, from the date of their appointment, as now provided by law for their respective grades and duties at the dates of their muster-out and discharge; and such officers so retained shall have, respectively, the same authority and jurisdiction as now conferred upon "officers of the bureau" by act of Congress passed on the sixteenth of July, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner is hereby empowered to sell for cash, or by installments with ample security, school buildings and other buildings constructed for refugees and freedmen by the bureau, to the associations, corporate bodies, or trustees who now use them for purposes of education or relief of want, under suitable guaranties that the purposes for which such buildings were constructed shall be observed: Provided, That all funds derived therefrom shall be returned to the bureau appropriation and accounted for to the Treasury of the United States.

CHAP. CXXXVI.—An Act to Incorporate the Congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Francis H. Smith, N. P. Chipman, Otis C. Wight, A. D. Robinson, Zenas C. Robbins, and their associates, who are now, or may hereafter become members of the congregation of the First Presbyterian church of Washington, in the District of Columbia, under the rules, regulations, or by-laws of the same, be, and they are hereby, created a body-corporate, under the name of "The Congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Washington," and as such shall have perpetual succession, may purchase, hold, and convey personal and real estate, make contracts, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and may generally exercise and enjoy all such powers as are usually vested in corporations, and as may be necessary or incident to sustaining religious worship, Sabbath schools, missionary, and charitable enterprises in the District of Columbia, and no others; and said corporation shall be exempt from any taxes to be assessed upon their corporate property under the authority of Congress, or of the city or county of Washington: Provided, That the value of all property so exempt shall not exceed two hundred thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the title to any lands, buildings, and property heretofore conveyed to said congregation, or to any person or persons for the use and benefit of the same, or of the said First Presbyterian church, is hereby vested in and confirmed to said corporation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for said congregation, at its first meeting subsequent to the passage of this act, to be held at such time and place as the persons named in the first section of this act may designate, by a majority of the members present, to adopt such by-laws as they may deem expedient, regulating the government of said corporation, prescribing the number, character, and duties of their officers, and the manner of their election, defining the terms on which persons may become, or cease to be, members of said corporation, and providing in all things for the holding and disposal and conveyance of its real and personal estate, and for the management of said congregation, which by-laws may be amended or repealed from time to time, under such regulations as said congregation may adopt: Provided, That no by-laws shall be adopted or remain in force inconsistent with the Government and laws of the United States, or with the constitution and authority of the Presbyterian church in the United States of America.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or abolish this charter at pleasure.

CHAP. CXXXIX.—An Act prescribing an Oath of Office to be taken by Persons from whom Legal Disabilities shall have been removed.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any person who has participated in the late rebellion, and from whom all legal disabilities arising therefrom have been removed by act of Congress by a vote of two thirds of each House, has been or shall be elected or appointed to any office or place of trust in or under the Government of the United States, he shall, before entering upon the duties thereof, instead of the oath prescribed by the act of July two, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

APPROVED, July 11, 1868.

CHAP. CXL.—An Act to Incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Augustus B. Stoughton, John Little, John L. Kidwell, George H. Plant, Le Roy Tuttle, G. W. Hopkins, R. M. Hall, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body-corporate, under the name of the "Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company," with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches and turnouts, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through and along the following avenues, streets, and highways: commencing at the intersection of Seventeenth street west and Pennsylvania avenue, along the west side of Seventeenth street to its intersection with H street north, thence along Seventeenth street west to its intersection with Connecticut avenue, thence along said avenue to Boundary street; also, from the intersection of Boundary street and Connecticut avenue along the county road from such intersection, thence on any road opened, or which may hereafter be opened, west of the Fourteenth street road to within or through the proposed public park, or to the county line of Washington county, with the right to run public carriages thereon drawn by horse-power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding six cents a passenger for any distance on said road: Provided, That should a majority of stockholders so elect, said road, after reaching the intersection of Boundary street and Connecticut avenue, instead of continuing from said intersection up the county road now opened, may be constructed along Boundary street in the direction of Meridian Hill to any county road opened, or which may hereafter be opened, west of Sixteenth street west, and thence along said county road by the most practicable route to the terminus near, at, in, or through the proposed park, as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said road shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real and personal property of said body-corporate, shall be liable to taxation as other real estate and personal property, and to license for their vehicles or cars in the city and county aforesaid, except as hereinafter provided

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said railway shall be laid in the centers of the avenues and streets in the city (excepting Seventeenth street, there it shall be laid as hereinbefore provided for,) as near as may be without interfering with or passing over the water or gas pipes, in the most approved manner adapted for street railways, with rails of the most approved pattern, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the streets or avenues; and the space between the two tracks, when two are laid, shall not be less than four feet, nor more than six feet; and the carriages shall not be less than six feet in width, the gauge to correspond with that of the Washington and Georgetown railroad. That the railway in the county shall be laid in such manner as will least interfere with the ordinary travel of the roads on which the said track shall be laid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said tracks, and for a space of two feet beyond the outer rail thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order, without expense to the United States, the city or county of Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall prevent the Government at any time, at their option, from altering the grade or otherwise improving all avenues and streets occupied by said road, or the city of Washington from so altering or improving such streets and avenues and the sewerage thereof, as may be under their respective authority and control; and in such event it shall be the duty of said company to change their said railway so as to conform to such grade and pavement.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize said body-corporate to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt to be used as a currency.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall not be less than fifty thousand dollars, nor more than two hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of twenty-five dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all the modern improvements for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon during the day as often as every ten minutes, between Pennsylvania avenue and Boundary street, and through the day and night on the entire road, or such portions as may be completed, as often as the public convenience may require.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall procure such passenger rooms, ticket offices, stables, and depots, at such points as the business of the railroad and the convenience of the public may require. And said company is hereby authorized to lay such rails through transverse or other streets as may be necessary for the exclusive purpose of connecting the said stables and depots with the main tracks. And the said company is hereby authorized to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for the passenger rooms, ticket offices, stables, and depots above mentioned.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of the said company shall be taken to their principal depot, and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours of business.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open, in some convenient and accessible place in the city of Washington, from nine o'clock in the forenoon until three o'clock in the afternoon, for a period, to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days, and said corporators shall give public notice by advertisement in the daily papers published in the city of Washington of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no one individual shall be allowed to subscribe for more than one hundred shares of said stock: Provided further, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing twenty-five per centum of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void. If, at the end of two days, a larger amount than the capital stock of said company shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed, and the said corporators named in the first section shall forthwith proceed to apportion said capital stock among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be done and completed on the same day the books are closed: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the twenty-five per centum at the time of subscribing except money. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within ten days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in two public newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notice to each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation. And in all meetings of stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for one year, and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors. And the said directors (a majority of whom, the president being one, shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company; and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall give bonds with surety to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper, tending the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter, or to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the city and county of Washington: Provided, That the directors of said corporation shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed at such time, after the first installment, in such manner and in such amounts as they may deem proper; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installments, as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of said stock as shall pay said installments, (and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due,) under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said corporation, or may sue for or collect the same in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report, in writing, of their doings to Congress and to the stockholders.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the mayor, council of said city, and the levy court of said county, and the several officers of these corporations, and the said corporations, are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operations of said railway, as herein authorized.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of the road-way. And if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage or destroy the cars, depot stations, or any other property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of ten dollars to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties in said city or county; and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act, as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That unless said corporation shall make and complete their said railway or railways between Pennsylvania avenue and Boundary street within eight months after the company shall have been organized, then this act shall be null and void, and no rights whatsoever shall be acquired under it; and that the remainder of said road shall be completed within four years to its proposed terminus in the county of Washington.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no regulations excluding any person from any car on account of color.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That each of the stockholders in the "Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company" shall be individually liable for all the debt[s] and liabilities of said company to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by such stockholder.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said company, when said road is completed between Pennsylvania avenue and Boundary street, to have prepared tickets for passengers on their cars, and to keep them at their office for sale by the package, at the rate of ten for fifty cents, and twenty for one dollar.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of the act incorporating the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, requiring reports of expenditures, earnings, and otherwise, shall be applicable to the company herein incorporated, which shall make reports as in said act required.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, which are inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act, are, for the purposes of this act, hereby repealed, so far as the same are inconsistent herewith.

APPROVED, July 13, 1868.

CHAP. CXXI.—An Act to Incorporate the National Hotel Company, of Washington City.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That George H. Calvert, R. C. Weightman, James C. McGuire, Zeph English, George H. Calvert, jr., and Charles B. Calvert, their associates, successors, and assigns, are hereby created a body corporate and politic by the name of the National Hotel Company, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and by that name they are made capable of taking, holding, managing, improving, purchasing, leasing, for the sole purpose of erecting and maintaining a hotel as aforesaid, real and personal estate within said city of Washington, not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars in value; said corporation to have a common seal, and the same may break, alter, and renew at pleasure; may prosecute and defend suits before all proper courts and tribunals; may make and ordain by-laws for the government of said corporation, and may have and enjoy all of those privileges and be subject to all of the liabilities which corporations for the holding, management, and improvement of real estate in the city of Washington, in the United States, usually enjoy or are made subject to.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, [That] the capital stock of the said company shall not be less than two hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars, be divided into shares of five hundred dollars each, and shall be deemed personal estate, and be transferable upon the books of the said corporation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, [That] the officers of the said corporation shall consist of a president and treasurer, with a board of directors, of whom the president and treasurer may be members, but the number of the directors may be fixed by the shareholders in the by-laws of the corporation. The president shall preside at the meetings of the corporation, sign certificates of the stock issued to stockholders, and shall have a general oversight over the business and affairs of the corporation; the treasurer shall safely keep and disburse all of the moneys of the corporation under the direction of the board of directors; the directors shall manage and control the property of the corporation, and make contracts in relation thereto; the treasurer, or other officer appointed by the by-laws, shall keep the records of the transactions of the corporation, and shall countersign the certificates of stock issued to the stockholders.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, [That] all the officers of the said corporation shall hold their offices for one year, and until their successors are elected and qualified to act, unless they shall be sooner removed by the directors. The first meeting of the corporation may be called by any person named herein by giving previous notice of not less than five days, to all the other persons herein named, of the time and place of such meeting. The annual meetings hereafter shall be called by the treasurer or other officer designated by the board, and be held in the city of Washington, at the National Hotel building, on the first Wednesday in January in each year, notice of which shall be sent to the post office address of each stockholder for ten days before the time for the holding of such meeting; and special meetings of the corporation may be called in the manner and time to be prescribed by the stockholders.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each stockholder shall be individually liable for the debts of the corporation to the amount of stock held by each respectively; and Congress hereby reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this charter at pleasure.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents be authorized to rent, under the direction of the Committees on Patents of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, such rooms as may be necessary for the speedy and convenient transaction of the business of the office: Provided, That all the moneys standing to the credit of the "patent fund," or in the hands of the Commissioner of Patents, and all moneys hereafter received at the Patent Office, for any purpose, or from any source whatever, shall be paid into the Treasury as received, without any deduction whatever; and the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for salaries and miscellaneous and contingent expenses of the Patent Office, and for withdrawals, and for monies [moneys] paid by mistake, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to communicate to Congress at the commencement of every December session a full and detailed account of moneys received for duties on patents and for copies of records and drawings, and all other moneys received by virtue of said office; and of all moneys expended by him under and by virtue of this provision for said contingent and miscellaneous expenses, and for salaries, and the names of the persons to whom such salaries are paid, and the amount thereof paid to each.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the city of Georgetown, the city of Washington, and the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, be, and they are hereby, authorized to levy and collect a special tax on the taxable property within their respective jurisdictions, for the erection of school-houses and the support of public schools, not exceeding fifty cents on each one hundred dollars for any one year, to be assessed and collected as other taxes.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws that regulate the prices of labor in the Government Printing Office be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to contract with the persons in that employment at such prices as are for the interest of the Government, and are just to those employed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of executing the fourth article of the treaty of Washington, concluded on the ninth day of August, eighteen hundred and forty-two, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the State of Maine, for ninety-one thousand one hundred and twenty-five acres of land assigned by said State to settlers under said article, a sum equal to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for twenty-six thousand one hundred and fifty acres of land a sum equal to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre:

Provided, That before said sums are paid the States of Maine and Massachusetts shall agree with the United States that the settlers upon their public lands in the late disputed territory in Maine entitled to be quieted in their possession, as ascertained by commissions heretofore instituted by said States, shall have been or shall be quieted by a release of the title of the said States.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is authorized to expend the appropriation heretofore made for the purpose of erecting a penitentiary for the Territory of Colorado, on the site belonging to and provided by the said Territory for the purpose: Provided, That no part of this property shall be sold or transferred without the consent of the United States first had and received.

CHAP. CLXXVIII.—An Act to facilitate the Settlement of certain Prize Cases in the Southern District of Florida.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the execution and delivery to him by the administratrix of the estate of James C. Clapp, deceased, late United States marshal for the southern district of Florida, of a proper written release of all claims and demands for, or on account of, all costs, charges, fees, and expenses due, or claimed to be due, the said Clapp as marshal aforesaid, or to his estate, in any prize or other cases in said district, to accept from said administratrix the sum of fifty thousand dollars in full satisfaction of all claims and demands of the United States against the estate of the said James C. Clapp, and against the sureties in said Clapp's official bond, and that said sum of fifty thousand dollars when paid, together with the sums now on deposit with the Assistant Treasurer in New York to the credit of the said Clapp and to the credit of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida, shall be deposited with the Assistant United States Treasurer at Washington, District of Columbia, subject to the order of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida, for the purpose of meeting decrees of distribution or restitution in the following prize causes pending in said district: schooner Lucy No. 1, the cargo of the steamer Adela, schooner Alicia and cargo, schooner Isabel and cargo, the steamer James Battle, schooner Diana and cargo, schooner Sea Lion and cargo, the cargo of the steamer Nita, steamer Pearl and cargo, schooner Teresa No. 2, steamer Union, steamer Victor and cargo, and schooner John Williams.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to deposit with the Assistant United States Treasurer at Washington, District of Columbia, the appraised values of the prize steamers Adela and Nita, condemned in said district court, and taken into the naval service, and, after deducting all proper charges and expenses, a moiety of the same shall be distributed under the decree of the said district court, according to law, among the captors entitled to share in said prizes, the steamers Adela and Nita respectively, and the remaining moiety of the same shall be subject to the order of the said district court, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That of the moneys mentioned in the first section of this act, when deposited as herein provided, there shall be retained by the said district court a sufficient fund to await final decrees in those of the cases enumerated in the first section of this act, wherein appeals have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States; and that the balance of said moneys, together with one half of the appraised values of the prize steamers Adela and Nita, mentioned in the second section of this act, shall be distributed as prize-money among the captors in those of the cases enumerated in the first section of this act, in which final decrees of condemnation have been entered, and which are ready for distribution, without reference to the interest of the United States in any and all of the said cases, which said interest of the United States in each of the said cases, and the proceeds for distribution therein, as well as the interest of the United States in the appraised value of the prize steamers Adela and Nita, is hereby relinquished for distribution to the captors in those of the cases enumerated and mentioned in the first section of this act wherein decrees of condemnation have been or shall be entered, and for payment to the claimants in those of said cases wherein final decrees of restitution have been or may be passed; and that in each of said cases wherein final decrees of condemnation and distribution have been or shall be entered, the sum to be paid into the Treasury of the United States for distribution to the captors shall be one half of the gross proceeds of sale in said cases, less the costs taxed and allowed by the court: Provided, That any sum or sums remaining after execution of all decrees of distribution and restitution as hereinbefore provided be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Navy pension fund: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed an admission on the part of the United States of any liability for the defalcation of the said Clapp as marshal aforesaid.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXIX.—An Act authorizing the Construction of a Bridge across the Missouri River, upon the Military Reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the Kansas and Missouri Bridge Company, a corporation having authority from the State of Kansas, to build a railroad, transit, and wagon bridge across the Missouri river upon or near the military reservation of Fort Leavenworth; and that when constructed all trains of all roads terminating at the Missouri river at or near the location of said bridge shall be allowed to cross said bridge for a reasonable compensation, to be paid to the owners thereof. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall not be in any case of less elevation than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge; nor shall the spans be of less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, in the clear, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, at low water.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the use of railroads leading to said bridge from either side of the river there is hereby granted a right of way through said Fort Leavenworth military reservation not exceeding for all of said roads three hundred feet in width: Provided, That said roads do not in any way interfere with the public buildings on said military reservation.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Kansas and Missouri bridge be, and the same is hereby, established as a post road, and that said bridge company shall have the right to take from said reservation, at such places as shall be designated by the Secretary of War, all stone, timber, and earth necessary to use in the construction of said bridge.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the right to alter or amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of bridges, is hereby expressly reserved.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, a corporation created by the laws of the State of Kansas, to build a bridge over and across the Missouri river at Saint Joseph, Missouri; and all the rights and privileges conferred by sections 1, 2, 4, and 5 of this act are hereby extended, so far as they are applicable, to the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, and the restrictions, limitations, and conditions contained in said sections are hereby made applicable to said company.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXX.—An Act for the Registration or Enrollment of certain Foreign Vessels.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue certificates of registry or enrollment and license to the schooner "Bob," of St. Andrew, New Brunswick; and to the following-named Canadian-built vessels, to wit: the schooner "Royal Albert," of Oakville; the bark "John Breden," the schooner "Prince Alfred," and the brigantine "Orkney Lass," all of Kingston; the schooner "George Henry," of Toronto; the schooner "Annexation," of Port Hope; and the schooner "Emperor," of St. Catharines; also the barges "Champlain" and "Hochelega," of Quebec; the bark "Monarch," the brig "Sea Gull," and the schooner "Smith & Post," all of Oakville; the schooner "Welland," of St. Catharines; the schooner "Governor," of Montreal; the schooner "L. S. Shicklana," of St. Catharines; the schooner "Victoria," of Toronto; said vessels being owned by citizens of the United States, and having been at all times employed upon the waters of the lakes: Provided, That there shall be paid upon each of said foreign-built vessels a tax equal to the internal revenue tax upon the materials and construction of similar vessels of American build.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXI.—An Act concerning the Tax Commissioners for the State of Arkansas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the acts and proceedings which have been had or performed by any two of the tax commissioners, in and for the State of Arkansas, shall have the same force and effect as if had and performed by all three of said commissioners.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXII.—An Act amendatory of an Act approved July twenty-six, [five,] eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "An Act to authorize the Construction of Certain Bridges, and to establish them as Post Roads."

Whereas the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, organized under an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, have been consolidated, in pursuance of the authority granted to the said Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, in their act of incorporation, and the authority granted to the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March nineteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight: Therefore,

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation may execute a mortgage and issue bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold, and their bridge across the Mississippi river and approaches thereto, when constructed, shall be a post road to carry the mails of the United States, and enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may hold their meetings in either the State of Illinois or the State of Missouri, as the board of directors may elect, and the directors may be citizens of any of the United States; and said corporation may sue and be sued in any circuit court of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act or in any previous legislation affecting the premises shall be so construed as to deprive the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Missouri of the right to regulate the tolls and fares which may be charged by said company for the use of such bridge: Provided further, That the tolls now fixed by the Legislatures of Illinois and Missouri shall not be increased.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXIII.—An Act providing for the Sale of a Portion of the Fort Gratiot Military Reservation in St. Clair county, in the State of Michigan.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell, at such times as he may deem most advantageous to the interests of the Government, and in such manner as hereinafter provided, all that portion of the military reservation known as Fort Gratiot, in St. Clair county, in the State of Michigan, which lies south of a line running due west from the south end of the Grand Trunk railroad wharf, on the St. Clair river, until it intersects the road known as the Lexington road, and all that portion which lies west of said Lexington road.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all that portion of the above-described lands which lies east of a line running due south from the point of intersection with the Lexington road, mentioned in the foregoing section of this act, shall be divided into blocks and lots of convenient size for building purposes, with public streets conforming as near as may be, without detriment to the interests of the Government or the State, to the public streets of the city of Port Huron, adjoining such ground, and sold by lots at public auction, at the city of Port Huron, to the highest bidder, public notice of such sale having first been given for thirty days by advertisement in all the papers published in the city of Port Huron, and in at least two papers published in the city of Detroit, Michigan. A plat of this division, made in accordance with the laws of the State of Michigan, shall be filed with the register of deeds of the county of St. Clair, State of Michigan. The remaining portion of said military reservation, for the sale of which provision is made in the first section of this act, shall be sold at public auction at the city of Port Huron, after due notice, as prescribed in the foregoing paragraph, at such times and in such parcels as may be deemed most advantageous to the interests of the Government, by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the proceeds arising from the sale herein provided for, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States in the same manner as the proceeds from the sale of other public lands.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXIV.—An Act to aid the Improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island Rapids, in the Mississippi river.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever in the prosecution of the improvements of the Mississippi river, at either the Des Moines or Rock Island rapids therein, it becomes necessary or proper to take possession of the right of way over any lands, or to use any earth, quarries, or other material lying adjacent or near to either of said works, and needful for its prosecution, the officer in charge of said work, or his assistant, may, in the name of the United States, take possession of and use the same, after having first paid, or secured to be paid, the value thereof, which may have been ascertained in the mode provided by the laws of the State wherein such property or material lie[s], for adjudging the value of private property which may be needed for any public improvement: Provided, however, That when the owner of such property or material shall fix a price for the same, which, in the opinion of the said officer in charge, shall be reasonable, he may take the same at such price without further delay.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a portion of the appropriations made or to be made for the prosecution of the improvements aforesaid, not exceeding fifty thousand dollars in amount, may be applied in payment of the property or material taken and used as aforesaid.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXV.—An Act declaratory of the Law in regard to Officers Cashiered or Dismissed from the Army by the Sentence of a General Court-Martial.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no officer of the Army of the United States who has been or shall hereafter be cashiered or dismissed from the service by the sentence of a general court-martial, formally approved by the proper reviewing authority, shall ever be restored to the military service except by a reappointment, confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CLXXXVI.—An Act Imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits on which the tax prescribed by law has not been paid a tax of fifty cents on each and every proof gallon, to be paid by the distiller, owner, or person having possession thereof before removal from distillery warehouse; and the tax on such spirits shall be collected on the whole number of gauge or wine gallons when below proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of proof spirit as defined in this act; and any fractional part of a gallon in excess of the number of gallons in a cask or package shall be taxed as a gallon. Every proprietor or possessor of a still, distillery, or distilling apparatus, and every person in any manner interested in the use of any such still, distillery, or distilling apparatus, shall be jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law on the distilled spirits produced therefrom, and the tax shall be a first lien on the spirits distilled, the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and on the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, together with any building thereon, from the time said spirits are distilled until the said tax shall be paid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That proof spirit shall be held and taken to be that alcoholic liquor which contains one half its volume of alcohol of a specific gravity of seven thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine ten thousandths (.7939) at sixty degrees Fahrenheit; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the prevention and detection of frauds by distillers of spirits, is hereby authorized to adopt and prescribe for use such hydrometers, saccharometers, weighing and gauging instruments, meters, or other means for ascertaining the quantity, gravity, and producing capacity of any mash, wort, or beer used or to be used in the production of distilled spirits, and the strength and quantity of spirits subject to tax, as he may deem necessary; and he may prescribe rules and regulations to secure a uniform and correct system of inspection, weighing, marking, and gauging of spirits. And in all sales of spirits hereafter made, a gallon shall be taken to be a gallon of proof spirit, according to the foregoing standard set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States. The tax on brandy made from grapes shall be the same and no higher than that upon other distilled spirits; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to exempt distillers of brandy from apples, peaches, or grapes exclusively from such other of the provisions of this act relating to the manufacture of spirits as in his judgment may seem expedient.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall adopt and prescribe for use any meter, meters, or meter safes, it shall be the duty of every owner, agent, or superintendent of a distillery to furnish and attach at his own expense such meter, meters, or meter safes as may have been prescribed for use at his distillery, and to furnish all the pipes, materials, labor, and facilities necessary to complete such attachment in accordance with the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby further authorized to order and require such changes of or additions to distilling apparatus, connecting pipes, pumps, or cisterns, or any machinery connected with or used in or on the distillery premises, or may require to be put on any of the stills, tubs, cisterns, pipes, or other vessels, such fastenings, locks, or seals as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol, and alcoholic spirit, within the true intent and meaning of this act, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance; and the tax shall attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such, whether it be subsequently separated as pure or impure spirit, or be immediately, or at any subsequent time, transferred into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process; and no mash, wort, or wash fit for distillation or the production of spirits or alcohol shall be made or fermented in any building or on any premises other than a distillery duly authorized according to law; and no mash, wort, or wash so made and fermented shall be sold or removed from any distillery before being distilled; and no person other than an authorized distiller shall by distillation, or by any other process, separate the alcoholic spirits from any fermented mash, wort, or wash; and no person shall use spirits of alcohol or any vapor of alcoholic spirits in manufacturing vinegar or any other article, or in any process of manufacture whatever, unless the spirits or alcohol so used shall have been produced in an authorized distillery and the tax thereon paid. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be fined, for every offense, not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than two years: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to fermented liquors.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person having in his possession or custody, or under his control, any still or distilling apparatus set up, shall register the same with the assistant assessor of the division in which said still or distilling apparatus shall be, by filing with him duplicate statements, in writing, subscribed by such person, setting forth the particular place where such still or distilling apparatus is set up, the kind of still and its cubic contents, the owner thereof, his place of residence, and the purpose for which said still or distilling apparatus has been or is intended to be used; one of which statements shall be retained and preserved by the assistant assessor and the other transmitted to the assessor of the district. Stills and distilling apparatus now set up shall be so registered within sixty days from the time this act takes effect, and those hereafter set up shall be so registered immediately upon their being set up. Any still or distilling apparatus not so registered, together with all personal property in the possession, or custody, or under the control of such person and found in the building, or in any yard or inclosure connected with the building, in which the same shall be set up, shall be forfeited. And any person having in his possession or custody, or under his control, any still or distilling apparatus set up which is not so registered, shall pay a penalty of five hundred dollars, and on conviction shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than one month nor more than two years.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in, or intending to be engaged in, the business of a distiller or rectifier, shall give notice in writing, subscribed by him, to the assessor of the district within which such business is to be carried on, stating his name and place of residence, and if a company or firm, the name and place of residence of each member thereof; the place where said business is to be carried on, and whether of distilling or rectifying. And if such business be carried on in a city, the residence and place of business shall be indicated by the name of the street and number of the building. In case of a distiller, the notice shall also state the kind of stills, and the cubic contents thereof, the number and kind of boilers, the number of mash tubs and fermenting-tubs, and the cubic contents of each tub, the number of receiving cisterns, and the cubic contents of each cistern, together with a particular description of the lot, or tract of land, on which the distillery is situated, with the size and description of the buildings thereon, and of what material constructed. The notice shall also state the number of hours in which the dis-tiller will ferment each tub of mash or beer, the estimated quantity of distilled spirits which the apparatus is capable of distilling every twenty-four hours, and the names and residence of every person interested or to be interested in the business, and that said distillery and the premises connected therewith are not within six hundred feet of any premises authorized to be used for rectifying or refining distilled spirits by any process. In case of a rectifier, the notice shall state the precise location of the premises where such business is to be carried on, the name and residence of every person interested or to be interested in the business, by what process the applicant intends to rectify, purify, or refine distilled spirits, the kind and cubic contents of any still used or to be used for such purpose, and the estimated quantity of spirits which can be rectified, purified, or refined every twenty-four hours in such establishment, and that said rectifying establishment is not within six hundred feet of the premises of any distillery registered for the distillation of spirits. In case of any change in the location, form, capacity, ownership, agency, superintendency, or in the persons interested in the business of such distillery or rectifying establishment, or in the time of fermenting the mash or beer, notice thereof, in writing, shall be given to the said assessor or to the assistant assessor of the division within twenty-four hours of said change. And any assistant assessor receiving such notice shall immediately transmit the same to the assessor of the district. Every notice required by this section shall be in such form and shall contain such additional particulars as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may from time to time prescribe. Any person failing or refusing to give such notice shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, and on conviction shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than two thousand dollars; and any person giving a false or fraudulent notice shall, on conviction, in addition to such penalty or fine, be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every distiller shall, on filing his notice of intention to continue or commence business, with the assessor before proceeding with such business, after the passage of this act and on the first day of May of each succeeding year, make and execute a bond in form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with at least two sureties, to be approved by the assessor of the district. The penal sum of said bond shall not be less than double the amount of tax on the spirits that can be distilled in his distillery during a period of fifteen days; but in no case shall such bond be for a less sum than five thousand dollars. The condition of the bond shall be that the principal shall faithfully comply with all the provisions of law in relation to the duties and business of distillers, and will pay all penalties incurred or fines imposed on him for a violation of any of the said provisions; that he will not suffer the lot or tract of land on which the distillery stands, or any part thereof, or any of the distilling apparatus, to be encumbered by mortgage, judgment, or other lien during the time in which he shall carry on said business. The assessor may refuse to approve said bond when, in his judgment, the situation of the distillery is such as would enable the distiller to defraud the United States; and in case of such refusal, the distiller may appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose decision in the matter shall be final. A new bond may be required in case of the death, insolvency, or removal of either of the sureties, and in any other contingency, at the discretion of the assessor or Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Any person failing or refusing to give the bond hereinbefore required, or to renew the same, or giving any false, forged, or fraudulent bond, shall forfeit the distillery, distilling apparatus, and all real estate and premises connected therewith, and on conviction shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than two years.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no bond of a distiller shall be approved unless he is the owner in fee, unencumbered by any mortgage, judgment, or other lien, of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, or unless he files with the assessor, in connection with his notice, the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any mortgagee, judgment creditor, or other person having a lien thereon, duly acknowledged, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and expressly stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority of such mortgage, judgment, or other encumbrance, and that in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, or any part thereof, the title of the same shall vest in the United States discharged from any such mortgage, judgment, or other encumbrance. In any case where the owner of a distillery or distilling apparatus, erected prior to the passage of this act, has an estate for a term of years only in the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, the lease or other evidence of title to which shall have been duly recorded prior to the passage of this act, the value of such lot or tract of land, together with the building and distilling apparatus, shall be appraised in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the assessor is hereby authorized to accept, in lieu of the said written consent of the owner of the fee, the bond of said distiller with not less than two sureties, who shall be residents of the collection district or county, or an adjoining county in the same State, in which the distillery is situated, and shall be the owners of unencumbered real estate in said district or county, or adjoining county, equal to such appraised value. The penal sum of said bond shall be equal to the appraised value of said lot or tract of land, together with the buildings and distilling apparatus, and such bonds shall be conditioned that in case the distillery, distilling apparatus, or any part thereof, shall, by final judgment, be forfeited for the violation of any of the provisions of law, the obligors will pay the amount stated in said bond. Said bond shall be in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every distiller and person intending to engage in the business of a distiller shall, previous to the approval of his bond, cause to be made, under the direction of the assessor of the district, an accurate plan and description, in triplicate, of the distillery and distilling apparatus, distinctly showing the location of every still, boiler, doubler, worm-tub, and receiving cistern, the course and construction of all fixed pipes used or to be used in the distillery, and of every branch thereof, and of every cock, or joint thereof, and of every valve therein, together with every place, vessel, tub, or utensil from and to which any such pipe shall lead, or with which it communicates. Such plan and description shall also show the number and location and cubic contents of every still, mash-tub, and fermenting-tub, together with the cubic contents of every receiving cistern, and the color of each fixed pipe, as required in this act. One copy of said plan and description shall be kept displayed in some conspicuous place in the distillery; two copies shall be furnished to the assessor of the district, one of which shall be kept by him and the other transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The accuracy of every such plan and description shall be verified by the assessor, the draughtsman, and the distiller; and no alteration shall be made in such distillery without the consent, in writing, of the assessor, which alteration shall be shown on the original or by a supplemental plan and description, and a reference thereto noted on the original, as the assessor may direct; and any supplemental plan and description shall be executed and preserved in the same manner as the original.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That immediately after the passage of this act every assessor shall proceed, at the expense of the United States, with the aid of some competent and skillful person, to be designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to make survey of each distillery registered or intended to be registered for the production of spirits in his district, to estimate and determine its true producing capacity, and in like manner shall estimate and determine the capacity of any such distillery as may hereafter be so registered in said district, a written report of which shall be made in triplicate, signed by the assessor and the person aiding in making the same, one copy of which shall be furnished to the distiller, one retained by the assessor, and the other immediately transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall at any time be satisfied that such report of the capacity of a distillery is in any respect incorrect or needs revision, he shall direct the assessor to make in like manner another survey of said distillery; the report of said survey shall be executed in triplicate and deposited as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for any assessor to assess a special tax upon any distiller, or for the collector to collect the same, or for any distiller who has heretofore paid a special tax as such to continue the business of distilling until such distiller shall have given the bond required by this act, and shall have complied with the provisions of law having reference to the registration and survey of distilleries, and having reference to the arrangement and construction of distilleries, and the premises connected therewith, in manner and as required by this act; nor shall it be lawful for any assessor of internal revenue to assess, or for any collector to collect, any special tax for distilling on any premises distant less than six hundred feet from any premises used for rectifying, nor shall any assessor assess or collector collect any special tax for rectifying distilled spirits on any premises distant less than six hundred feet from any distillery when the distillery and rectifying establishments are occupied and used by different persons; nor shall the processes of distillation and rectification both be carried on within the distance of six hundred feet. In all cases where a distillery and rectifying establishment, distant the one from the other less than six hundred feet, are occupied and used by the same person, said person shall have the right to elect which business shall be discontinued at that place. In all cases where rectifying or distilling shall be discontinued under the provisions of this section, and the time for which the special tax for rectifying or distilling was paid remains unexpired, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to refund out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on requisition of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a proportionate part of any sum originally paid for special tax therefor, which shall be in such ratio to the whole sum paid as the unexpired time for which special tax was paid shall bear to the whole term for which the same was paid. Any collector or assessor of internal revenue who shall fail to perform any duty imposed by this section, or shall assess or collect any special tax in violation of its provisions, shall be liable to a penalty of five thousand dollars for each offense.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no person shall use any still, boiler, or other vessel for the purpose of distilling in any dwelling-house, nor in any shed, yard, or inclosure connected with any dwelling-house, nor on board of any vessel or boat, nor in any building or on any premises where beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other fermented liquors, vinegar or other are manufactured or produced, or where sugars or sirups are refined, or where liquors of any description are retailed, or where any other business is carried on, nor within six hundred feet from any premises authorized to be used for rectifying; and every person who shall use any still, boiler, or other vessel for the purpose of distilling, as aforesaid, in any building or other premises where the above-specified articles are manufactured, produced, refined, or retailed, or other business is carried on, or on board of any vessel or boat, or in any dwelling-house, or other place as aforesaid, or shall aid or assist therein, or who shall cause or procure the same to be done, shall, on conviction, be fined one thousand dollars and imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than two years, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That saleratus may be manufactured, or meal or flour ground from grain in any building or on any premises where spirits are distilled; but such meal or flour only to be used for distillation on the premises.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That there shall be assessed and collected monthly, from every authorized distiller whose distillery has an aggregate capacity for mashing and fermenting twenty bushels of grain or less, or sixty gallons of molasses or less, in twenty-four hours, a tax of two dollars per day, Sundays excepted; and a tax of two dollars per day for every twenty bushels of grain or sixty gallons of molasses of said capacity in excess of twenty bushels of grain or sixty gallons of molasses in twenty-four hours. But any distiller who shall suspend work, as provided by this act, shall pay only two dollars per day during the time the work shall be so suspended in his distillery.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall manufacture any still, boiler, or other vessel, to be used for the purpose of distilling, shall, before the same is removed from the place of manufacture, notify in writing the assessor of the district in which such still, boiler, or other vessel is to be used or set up, by whom it is to be used, its capacity, and the time when the same is to be removed from the place of manufacture; and no such still, boiler, or other vessel shall be set up without the permit in writing of the said assessor for that purpose; and any person who shall set up any such still, boiler, or other vessel, without first obtaining a permit from the said assessor of the district in which such still, boiler, or other vessel is intended to be used, or who shall fail to give such notice, shall pay in either case the sum of five hundred dollars, and shall forfeit the distilling apparatus thus removed or set up in violation of law.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That every distiller shall provide, at his own expense, a warehouse, to be situated on and to constitute a part of his distillery premises, to be used only for the storage of distilled spirits of his own manufacture; but no dwelling-house shall be used for such purpose, and no door, window, or other opening shall be made or permitted in the walls of such warehouse leading into the distillery or into any other room or building; and such warehouse, when approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on report of the collector, is hereby declared to be a bonded warehouse of the United States, to be known as a distillery warehouse, and shall be under the direction and control of the collector of the district, and in charge of an internal revenue storekeeper assigned thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the tax on the spirits stored in such warehouse shall be paid before removal from such warehouse.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any distillery, established as hereinbefore provided, shall erect, in a room or building to be provided and used for that purpose, and for no other, and to be constructed in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, two or more receiving cisterns, each to be at least of sufficient capacity to hold all the spirits distilled during the day of twenty-four hours, into which shall be conveyed all the spirits produced in said distillery; and each of such cisterns shall be so constructed as to leave an open space of at least three feet between the top thereof and the floor or roof above, and of not less than eighteen inches between the bottom thereof and the floor below, and shall be so situated that the officer can pass around the same, and shall be connected with the outlet of the worm or condenser by suitable pipes or other apparatus so constructed as always to be exposed to the view of the officer, and so connected and constructed as to prevent the abstraction of spirits while passing from the outlet of the worm or condenser back to the still or doubler, or forward to the receiving cistern; such cisterns, and the room in which they are contained, shall be in charge of and under the lock and seal of the internal revenue gauger designated for that duty; and on the third day after the spirits are conveyed into such cisterns the same shall be drawn off into casks under the supervision of such gauger in the presence of the storekeeper, and be removed directly to the distillery warehouse; and on special application to the assessor or assistant assessor by the owner, agent, or superintendent of any distillery, the spirits may be drawn off from the said cisterns under the supervision of the gauger at any time previous to the third day. All locks and seals required by law shall be provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at the expense of the owner of the distillery or warehouse; and the keys shall be in charge of the collector or such gauger as he may designate.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the door of the furnace of every still or boiler used in any distillery shall be so constructed that it may be securely fastened and locked. The fermenting-tubs shall be so placed as to be easily accessible to any revenue officer, and each tub shall have distinctly painted thereon in oil colors its cubic contents in gallons, and the number of the tub. There shall be a clear space of not less than one foot around every wood still, and not less than two feet around every doubler and worm tank. The doubler and worm tanks shall be elevated not less than one foot from the floor; and every fixed pipe to be used by the distiller, except for conveyance of water, or of spent mash or beer only, shall be so fixed and placed as to be capable of being examined by the officer for the whole of its length or course, and shall be painted, and kept painted, as follows, that is to say: every pipe for the conveyance of mash or beer shall be painted of a red color; every pipe for the conveyance of low wines back into the still or doubler shall be painted blue; every pipe for the conveyance of spirits shall be painted black; and every pipe for the conveyance of water shall be painted white. If any fixed pipe shall be used by any distiller which shall not be painted or kept painted as herein directed, or which shall be painted otherwise than as herein directed, he shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars. No assessor shall approve the bond of any distiller until all the requirements of the law and all regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to distilleries, in pursuance thereof, shall have been complied with. Any assessor who shall violate the provisions of this section shall forfeit and pay two thousand dollars, and shall be dismissed from office.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in distilling or rectifying spirits, and every wholesale liquor dealer and compounder of liquors, shall place and keep conspicuously on the outside of his distillery, rectifying establishment, or place of business, a sign, in plain and legible letters, not less than three inches in length, painted in oil colors or gilded, and of a proper and proportionate width, the name or firm of the distiller, rectifier, wholesale dealer, or compounder, with the words "registered distillery," "rectifier of spirits," "wholesale liquor dealer," or "compounder of liquors," as the case may be; and no fence or wall of a height greater than five feet shall be erected or maintained around the premises of any distillery, so as to prevent easy and immediate access to said distillery; and every distiller shall furnish to the assessor of the district as many keys of the gates and doors of the distillery as may be required by the assessor, from time to time, for any revenue officer or other person who may be authorized to make survey or inspections of the premises or of the contents thereof; and said distillery shall be kept always accessible to any officer or other person having any such key. Any person who shall violate any of the foregoing provisions of this section by negligence or refusal, or otherwise, shall pay a penalty of five hundred dollars. Any person not having paid the special tax, as required by law, who shall put up the sign required by this section, or any sign indicating that he may lawfully carry on the business of a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, shall forfeit and pay one thousand dollars, and, on conviction, shall be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months; and any person who shall work in any distillery, rectifying establishment, wholesale liquor store, or in the store of any compounder of liquors, on which no sign shall be placed and kept as hereinbefore provided, and any person who shall knowingly receive at, carry, or convey any distilled spirits to or from any such distillery, rectifying establishment, warehouse, or store, or who shall knowingly carry and deliver any grain, molasses, or other raw material to any distillery on which such sign shall not be placed and kept, shall forfeit all horses, carts, drays, wagons, or other vehicle or animal used in carrying or conveying of such property aforesaid, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That every person making or distilling spirits, or owning any still, boiler, or other vessel used for the purpose of distilling spirits, or having such still, boiler, or other vessel so used under his superintendence, either as agent or owner, or using any such still, boiler, or other vessel, shall, from day to day, make, or cause to be made, true and exact entry in a book or books, to be kept by him, in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, of the kind of materials, and the quantity in pounds, bushels, or gallons purchased by him for the production of spirits, from whom and when purchased, and by what conveyance delivered at said distillery, together with the amount paid for thereof, the kind and quantity of fuel purchased for use in the distillery, and from whom purchased, the amount paid for ice or water for use in the distillery, the repairs placed on said distillery or distilling apparatus, the cost thereof, and by whom and when made, and the name and residence of each person employed in or about the distillery, and in what capacity employed; and in another book shall make like entry [of] the quantity of grain or other material used for the production of spirits, the time of day when any yeast or other composition is put into any mash or beer for the purpose of exciting fermentation, the quantity of mash in each tub, designating the same by the number of the tub, the number of dry inches, that is to say, the number of inches between the top of each tub and the surface of the mash or beer therein at the time of yeasting, the gravity and temperature of the beer at the time of yeasting, and on every day thereafter its quantity, gravity, and temperature at the hour of twelve meridian; also the time when any fermenting-tub is emptied of ripe mash or beer, the number of gallons of spirits distilled, the number of gallons placed in warehouse, and the proof thereof, and the number of gallons sold or removed, with the proof thereof, and the name, place of business and residence of the person to whom sold; and every fermenting-tub shall be emptied at the end of the fermenting period, and shall remain empty for a period of twenty-four hours. On the first, eleventh, and twenty-first days of each month, or within five days thereafter, respectively, every distiller shall render to the assistant assessor an account in duplicate, taken from his books, stating the quantity and kind of materials used for the production of spirits each day, and the number of wine gallons and of proof gallons of spirits produced and placed in warehouse. And the distiller or the principal manager of the distillery shall make and subscribe the following oath, to be attached to said return:

"I, ———, distiller, (or principal manager, as the case may be,) of the distillery at ———, do solemnly swear that, since the date of the last return of the business of said distillery, dated ——— day of ——— to ——— day of ———, both inclusive, there was produced in said distillery, and withdrawn and placed in warehouse, the number of wine gallons and proof gallons of spirits, and there were actually mashed and used in said distillery, and consumed in the production of spirits therein, the several quantities of grain, sugar, molasses, and other materials, respectively, hereinbefore specified, and no more."

The said book shall always be kept at the distillery, and be always open to the inspection of any revenue officer, and, when filled up, shall be preserved by the distiller for a period not less than two years thereafter, and whenever required shall be produced for the inspection of any revenue officer. If any false entry shall be made in either of said books, or any entry required to be made therein shall be omitted therefrom, for every such false entry made, or omission, the distiller shall forfeit and pay a penalty of one thousand dollars. And if any such false entry shall be made, or any entry shall be omitted therefrom with intent to defraud or to conceal from the revenue officers any fact or particular required to be stated and entered in either of said books, or to mislead in reference thereto, or if any distiller as aforesaid shall omit or refuse to provide either of said books, or shall cancel, obliterate, or destroy any part of either of such books, or any entry therein, with intent to defraud, or shall permit the same to be done, or such books, or either of them, be not produced when required by any revenue officer, the distillery, distilling apparatus, and the lot or tract of land on which it stands, and all personal property of every kind and description on said premises used in the business there carried on, shall be forfeited to the United States. And any person making such false entry or omitting to make any entry hereinbefore required to be made, with the intent aforesaid, or who shall cause or procure the same to be done, or who shall fraudulently cancel, obliterate, or destroy any part of said books, or any entry therein, or who shall willfully fail to produce such books, or either of them, on conviction shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That on receipt of the distiller's first return in each month, the assessor shall inquire and determine whether said distiller has accounted in his returns for the preceding month for all the spirits produced by him; and to determine the quantity of spirits thus to be accounted for the whole quantity of materials used for the production of spirits shall be ascertained; and forty-five gallons of mash or beer brewed or fermented from grain shall represent not less than one bushel of grain, and seven gallons of mash or beer brewed or fermented from molasses shall represent not less than one gallon of molasses. In case the return of the distiller shall have been less than the quantity thus ascertained, the distiller or other person liable shall be assessed for such deficiency at the rate of fifty cents for every proof gallon, together with the special tax of four dollars for every cask of forty proof gallons, and the collector shall proceed to collect the same as in cases of other assessments for deficiencies; but in no case shall the quantity of spirits returned by the distiller, together with the quantity so assessed, be for a less quantity of spirits than eighty per centum of the producing capacity of the distillery, as estimated under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the storekeeper assigned to any distillery warehouse shall also have charge of the distillery connected therewith; and, in addition to the duties required of him as a storekeeper in charge of a warehouse, shall keep in a book to be provided for that purpose, and in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a daily account of all the meal and vegetable productions or other substances brought into said distillery, or on said premises, to be used for the purpose of producing spirits, from whom purchased, and when delivered at said distillery, the kind and quantity of all fuel used, and from whom purchased, and of all repairs made on said distillery, and by whom and when made, the names and places of residence of all persons employed in or about the distillery, of the materials put into the mash-tub or otherwise used for the production of spirits, the time when any fermenting-tub is emptied of ripe mash or beer, recording the same by the number painted on said tub, and of all spirits drawn off from the receiving cistern, and the time when the same were drawn off. Any distiller or person employed in any distillery who shall use, cause, or permit to be used any material for the purpose of making mash, wort, or beer, or for the production of spirits, or shall remove any spirits in the absence of the storekeeper or person designated to act as said storekeeper, shall forfeit and pay double the amount of taxes on the spirits so produced, distilled, or removed, and, in addition thereto, be liable to a penalty of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That every distiller, at the hour of twelve meridian, on the third day after that on which his bond shall have been approved by the assessor, shall be deemed to have commenced and thereafter to be continuously engaged in the production of distilled spirits in his distillery, except in the intervals when he shall have suspended work, as hereinafter authorized or provided. Any distiller desiring to suspend work in his distillery may give notice in writing to the assistant assessor of his division, stating when he will suspend work; and on the day mentioned in said notice said assistant assessor shall, at the expense of the distiller, proceed to fasten securely the door of every furnace of every still or boiler in said distillery, by locks and otherwise, and shall adopt such other means as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe to prevent the lighting of any fire in such furnace or under such stills or boilers. The locks and seals, and other materials required for such purpose, shall be furnished to the assessor of the district by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be duly accounted for by said assessor. Such notice by any distiller, and the action taken by the assistant assessor in pursuance thereof, shall be immediately reported to the assessor of the district, and by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. No distiller, after having given such notice, shall, after the time stated therein, carry on the business of a distiller on said premises until he shall have given another notice in writing to said assessor, stating the time when he will resume work; and at the time so stated for resuming work the assistant assessor shall attend at the distillery to remove said locks and other fastenings; and thereupon, and not before, work may be resumed in said distillery, which fact shall be immediately reported to the assessor of the district, and by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Any distiller, after the time fixed in said notice declaring his intention to suspend work, who shall carry on the business of a distiller on said premises, or shall have mash, wort, or beer in his distillery, or on any premises connected therewith, or who shall have in his possession, or under his control, any mash, wort, or beer, with intent to distill the same on said premises, shall incur the forfeitures and be subject to the same punishment as provided for persons who carry on the business of a distiller without having paid the special tax.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits shall be drawn from the receiving cisterns into casks, each of not less capacity than twenty gallons wine measure, and shall thereupon be gauged, proved, and marked by an internal revenue gauger, by cutting on the cask containing such spirits, in a manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the quantity in wine gallons, and in proof gallons, of the contents of such cask, and shall be immediately removed into the distillery warehouse, and the gauger shall, in presence of the storekeeper of the warehouse, place upon the head of the cask an engraved stamp, which shall be signed by the collector of the district and the storekeeper and gauger, and shall have written thereon the number of proof gallons contained therein, the name of the distiller, the date of the receipt in the warehouse, and the serial number of each cask, in progressive order, as the same shall be received from the distillery. Such serial number for every distillery shall begin with number one (No. 1) with the first cask deposited therein after this act takes effect, and no two or more casks warehoused at the same distillery shall be marked with the same number. The said stamp shall be as follows:

Distillery warehouse stamp No. —.
Issued by —, collector, — district,
State of —. Distillery warehouse of —,
18—, Cask No. —, contents — gallons, proof spirit.

United States Storekeeper.

Attest:

United States Gauger.

And the distiller or owner of all spirits so removed to the distillery warehouse shall, on the first, eleventh, and twenty-first days of each month, or within five days thereafter, enter the same for deposit in such warehouse, under such rules and regulations, not inconsistent herewith, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe; and said entry shall be in triplicate, and shall contain the name of the person making the entry, the designation of the warehouse in which the deposit is made, and the date thereof, and [shall] be in form as follows:

Entry for deposit in distillery warehouse.
Entry of distilled spirits deposited by — —, in distillery warehouse —, in the — district, State of —, on the — day of —, anno Domini —.

And the entry shall specify the kind of spirits, the whole number of casks, the marks and serial numbers thereon; the number of gauge or wine gallons and of proof gallons, and the amount of the tax on the spirits contained in them; all of which shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the distiller or owner of the same attached to the entry; and the said distiller or owner shall give his bond in duplicate, with one or more sureties satisfactory to the collector of the district, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will pay the tax on the spirits, as specified in the entry, or cause the same to be paid before removal from said distillery warehouse, and within one year from the date of said bond; and the penal sum of such bond shall not be less than double the amount of the tax on such distilled spirits. One of said entries shall be retained in the office of the collector of the district, one sent to the storekeeper in charge of the warehouse, to be retained and filed in the warehouse, and one sent with the duplicate of the bond to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be filed in his office.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That any distilled spirits may, on payment of the tax thereon, be withdrawn from warehouse on application to the collector of the district in charge of such warehouse, on making a withdrawal entry, in duplicate, and in form as follows:

Entry for withdrawal of distilled spirits from warehouse. Tax paid.

Entry of distilled spirits to be withdrawn, on payment of the tax, from — warehouse by —, deposited on the — day of —, anno Domini —, by —, in said warehouse.

And the entry shall specify the whole number of casks with the marks and serial numbers thereon, the number of gauge or wine gallons, and of proof gallons, and the amount of the tax on the distilled spirits contained in them; all of which shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the person making such entry; and on payment of the tax the collector shall issue his order to the storekeeper in charge of the warehouse for the delivery. One of said entries shall be filed in the office of the collector, and the other transmitted by him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That whenever an order is received from the collector for the removal from any distillery warehouse of any cask of distilled spirits, on which tax has been paid, it shall be the duty of the gauger by whom the same is gauged and inspected, in presence of the storekeeper, before such cask has left the warehouse, to place upon the head thereof, in such manner as to cover no portion of any brand or mark prescribed by law already placed thereon, a stamp, on which shall be engraved the number of proof gallons contained in said cask on which the tax has been paid, and which shall be signed by the collector of the district, storekeeper, and gauger, and which shall state the serial number of the cask, the name of the person by whom the tax was paid, and the person to whom the place where it is to be delivered; which stamp shall be as follows:

Tax-paid stamp No. —.

tax on — gallons proof spirit, cask No. —, — warehouse at —, for delivery to —
at —.

Collector — District, State of —.

Attest:

U. S. Storekeeper.

U. S. Gauger.

And at the time of affixing the tax-paid stamp or stamps, the gauger shall, in the presence of the storekeeper, cut or burn upon each cask the name of the distiller, the district, the date of the payment of [the] tax, the number of proof gallons, and the number of the stamp, which cutting or burning shall be erased when such cask is emptied by cutting or burning a canceling line across such marks or brands.

Whenever any cask or package of rectified spirits shall be filled for shipment, sale, or delivery, on the premises of any rectifier, who shall have paid the special tax required by law, it shall be the duty of a United States gauger to gauge and inspect the same and place thereon an engraved stamp, which shall be signed by the collector of the district and the said gauger, and state the date when affixed, and the number of proof gallons, which stamp shall be as follows:

Stamp for rectified spirits No.—
 Issued by ———, collector ——— district,
 State of ———,
 ———, rectifier of spirits in the ——— district, State of ———, 18—, ——— proof gallons.

U. S. Gauger.

Whenever any cask or package of distilled spirits shall be filled for shipment, sale, or delivery on the premises of any wholesale liquor dealer or compounder, it shall be the duty of a United States gauger to gauge and inspect the same, and place thereon an engraved stamp, signed by the collector of the district and the said gauger, stating the name of the compounder or dealer and the date when affixed, and the number of proof gallons, which stamp shall be as follows:

Wholesale liquor dealer's stamp No.—
 Issued by ———, collector ——— district,
 State of ———,
 ———, wholesale liquor dealer, of ——— ——— district, State of ———, 18—,
 ——— proof gallons.

U. S. Gauger, ——— District, State of ———.

All blanks in any of the above forms shall be duly filled in accordance with the facts in each case. And the stamps above designated shall be affixed so as to fasten the same securely to the cask or package and duly canceled, and shall then be immediately covered with a coating of transparent varnish or other substance, so as to protect them from removal or damage by exposure; and such affixing, cancellation, and covering shall be done in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall by regulation prescribe; but such stamps shall in every case be affixed to a smooth surface of the cask or other package, which surface shall not have been previously painted or covered with any substance.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That all stamps required for distilled spirits shall be engraved in their several kinds in book form, and shall be issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to any collector, upon his requisition, in such numbers as may be necessary in the several districts. Each stamp shall have an engraved stub attached thereto with a number thereon corresponding with an engraved number on the stamp, and the stub shall not be removed from the book. And there shall be entered on the corresponding stub such memoranda of the contents of every stamp as shall be necessary to preserve a perfect record of the use of such stamp when detached.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That every stamp for the payment of tax on distilled spirits shall have engraved thereon words and figures representing a decimal number of gallons, and a similar number of gallons shall be engraved on the stub corresponding to such stamp, and between the stamp and the stub, and connecting them, shall be engraved nine coupons, which, beginning next to the stamp, shall indicate in succession the several numbers of gallons between the number named in the stamp and the decimal number next above. And whenever any collector shall receive the tax on the distilled spirits contained in any cask he shall detach from the book a stamp representing the denominate quantity nearest to the quantity of proof spirits in such cask, as shown by the gauger's return, with such number of the coupons attached thereto as shall be necessary to make up the whole number of proof gallons in said cask, and any quantity in addition to the number of full gallons less than one gallon shall be regarded as a full gallon; and all unused coupons shall remain attached to the marginal stub; and no coupon shall have any value or significance whatever when detached from the stamp and stub. And the tax-paid stamps with the coupons may denote such number of gallons, not less than twenty, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may deem advisable.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That the books of tax-paid stamps issued to any collector shall be charged to his account at the full value of the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons contained in said books; and every collector shall make monthly return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of all tax-paid stamps issued by him to be affixed to any cask or package containing distilled spirits, on which the tax has been paid, and account for the amount of the tax collected; and when the said collector shall return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any book of marginal stubs, which it shall be his duty to do as soon as all the stamps contained in the book, when issued to him from the office of internal revenue, have been used, and shall have accounted for the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons that were contained in said book, there shall be allowed a commission of half of one per centum on the amount of the tax on spirits distilled after the passage of this act, in addition to any other commission by law allowed, which shall be equally divided between the collector receiving the tax and the assessor of the district in which the distilled spirits were produced. All stamps relating to distilled spirits other than the tax-paid stamps shall be charged to collectors as representing the value of twenty-five cents for each stamp; and the books containing such stamps may be intrusted by any collector to the gauger of the district, who shall make a daily report to the assessor and collector of all such stamps used by him, and for whom used, and from these reports the assessor of the district shall assess the person for whom they were used, and the collector shall thereupon collect the amount due for such stamps at the rate of twenty-five cents for each stamp issued during the month; and when all the stamps contained in any such book shall have been issued, the gauger of the district shall return the book to the collector with all the marginal stubs therein.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That any revenue officer who shall affix or cancel, or cause or permit to be affixed or canceled, any stamp relating to distilled spirits required or provided for in this act in any other manner or in any other place, or who shall issue the same to any other person than as provided by law, or regulation made in pursuance thereof, or who shall knowingly affix or permit to be affixed any such stamp to any cask or package of spirits of which the whole or any part has been distilled, rectified, compounded, removed, or sold, in violation of law, or which has in any manner escaped payment of tax due thereon, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than three thousand dollars, and be imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than three years.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That if any distiller shall desire to reduce the producing capacity of his distillery, he shall give notice of such intention in writing to said assessor, stating the quantity of spirits which he desires thereafter to manufacture or produce every twenty-four hours, and thereupon said assessor shall proceed, at the expense of the distiller, to reduce and limit the producing capacity of the distillery to the quantity stated in said notice, by placing upon a sufficient number of the fermenting-tubs close-fitting covers, which shall be securely fastened by nails, seals, and otherwise, and in such manner as to prevent the use of such tubs without removing said covers or breaking said seals, and shall adopt such other precautions as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to reduce the capacity of said distillery. And any person who shall break, injure, or in any manner tamper with any lock, seal, or other fastening applied to any furnace, still, or fermenting-tub, or other vessel, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or who shall open or attempt to open any door, tub, or other vessel which shall have been locked or sealed, or otherwise closed or fastened as herein provided, or who shall use any furnace, still, or fermenting-tub, or other vessel which shall be so locked, sealed, or fastened, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than one year, nor more than three years.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer shall require that the water contained in any worm-tub in a distillery, at any time when the still shall not be at work, shall be drawn off, and the tub and worm cleaned, the water shall forthwith be drawn off, and the tub and worm cleaned by the distiller or his workmen accordingly; and the water shall be kept and continued out of such worm-tub for the space of two hours, or until the officer has finished his examination thereof; and for any refusal or neglect to comply with the requisition of the officer in this behalf, or the provision in this clause contained, the distiller shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars, and it shall be lawful for the officer to draw off such water, or any portion of it, and to keep the same drawn off for so long a time as he shall think necessary.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any revenue officer, at all times, as well by night as by day, to enter into any distillery, or building, or place, used for the business of distilling, or in connection therewith, for storage or other purposes, and to examine, gauge, measure, and take an account of every still or other vessel or utensil of any kind, and of all low wines, and of the quantity and gravity of all mash, wort, or beer, and of all yeast, or other compositions for exciting or producing fermentation in any mash or beer, and of all spirits and of all materials for making or distilling spirits, which shall be in any such distillery or premises, or in the possession of the distiller; and if any revenue officer, or any person called by him to his aid, shall be hindered, obstructed, or prevented by any distiller or by any workman, or other person acting for such distiller or in his employ, from entering into any such distillery, or building, or place as aforesaid; or if any such officer shall be by the distiller, or his workman, or any person in his employ, prevented or hindered from, or opposed, or obstructed, or molested in the performance of his duty under this act, in any respect, the distiller shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars. If any officer, having demanded admittance into a distillery or premises of a distillery, and having declared his name and office, shall not be admitted into such distillery or premises by the distiller or other person having charge of the same, it shall be lawful for such officer, at all times, as well by night as by day, to break open by force any of the doors or windows, or to break through any of the walls of such distillery or premises necessary to be broken open or through, to enable him to enter the said distillery or premises; and the distiller shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That on the demand of any revenue officer, every distiller, rectifier, or compounder of spirits shall furnish strong, safe, and convenient ladders of sufficient length to enable the officer to examine and gauge any vessel or utensil in such distillery or premises; and shall, at all times when required, supply all assistance, lights, ladders, tools, staging, or other things necessary for inspecting the premises, stock, tools, and apparatus belonging to such person, and shall open all doors, and open for examination all boxes, packages, and all casks, barrels, and other vessels not under the control of a revenue officer in charge, under a penalty of five hundred dollars for every refusal or neglect so to do.

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any revenue officer, and any person acting in his aid, to break up the ground on any part of the distillery or premises of a distiller, rectifier, or compounder of liquors, or any ground adjoining or near to such distillery or premises, or any wall or partition thereof, or belonging thereto, or other place, to search for any pipe, cock, private conveyance, or utensil; and upon finding any such pipe or conveyance leading therefrom or thereto, he may break up any ground, house, wall, or other place through or into which such pipe or other conveyance shall lead, and break or cut away such pipe or other conveyance, and turn any cock, or examine whether such pipe or other conveyance may convey or conceal any mash, wort, or beer, or other liquor which may be used for distillation of low wines or spirits from the sight or view of the officer, so as to prevent or hinder him from taking a true account thereof.

SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That no malt, corn, grain, or other material shall be mashed, nor any mash, wort, or beer brewed or made, nor any still used by a distiller at any time between the hour of eleven in the afternoon of any Saturday and the hour of one in the forenoon of the next succeeding Monday; and any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 36. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a distillery or distillery warehouse, not having been removed therefrom according to law, shall be forfeited to the United States. And in case of the seizure of any distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a distillery, distillery warehouse, or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law, or in the store or place of business of a rectifier, or of a wholesale liquor dealer, or of a compounder of liquors, or in transit from any one of said places; and in case of the seizure of any distilled spirits found in any one of the places aforesaid, or in transit therefrom, which shall not have been received into or sent out therefrom in conformity to law, or in regard to which any of the entries required by law to be made in the books of the owner of such spirits or of the storekeeper, wholesale dealer, rectifier, or compounder, have not been made at the time or in the manner required, or in respect to which the owner or person having possession, control, or charge of said spirits shall have omitted to do any act required to be done, or shall have done or committed any act prohibited in regard to said spirits, the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant of said spirits to show that no fraud has been committed, and that all the requirements of the law in relation to the payment of the tax have been complied with. And any person who shall remove, or shall aid or abet in the removal of any distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, or who shall conceal or aid in the concealment of any spirits so removed, or who shall remove or shall aid or abet in the removal of any distilled spirits from any distillery warehouse, or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law, in any manner other than is provided by law, or who shall conceal, or aid in the concealment of any spirits so removed, shall be liable to a penalty of double the tax imposed on such distilled spirits so removed or concealed, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than two hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That no person shall remove any distilled spirits at any other time than after sun-rising and before sun-setting, in any cask or package containing more than ten gallons from any premises or building in which the same may have been distilled, redistilled, rectified, compounded, manufactured, or stored, and every person who shall violate this provision shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars for each cask, barrel, or package of spirits so removed; and said spirits, together with any vessel containing the same, and any horse, cart, boat, or other conveyance used in the removal thereof, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall add or cause to be added any ingredient or substance to any distilled spirits, before the tax imposed by law shall have been paid thereon, for the purpose of creating a fictitious proof, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars for each cask or package so adulterated, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years, and every such cask or package, with its contents, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 39. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall evade or attempt to evade the payment of the tax on any distilled spirits, in any manner whatever, shall forfeit and pay double the amount of the tax so evaded or attempted to be evaded; and any person who shall change or alter any stamp, mark, or brand on any cask or package containing distilled spirits, or who shall put into any cask or package spirits of greater strength than is indicated by the inspection mark thereon, or who shall fraudulently use any cask or package having any inspection mark or stamp thereon for the purpose of selling other spirits or spirits of quantity or quality different from the spirits previously inspected therein, shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred dollars for every cask or package on which the stamp or mark is so changed or altered, or which is so fraudulently used, and, on conviction, shall be fined for each such offense not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year.

SEC. 40. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly use any false weights or measures in ascertaining, weighing, or measuring the quantities of grain, meal, or vegetable materials, molasses, beer, or other substances to be used for distillation, or who shall destroy, break, injure, or tamper with any lock or seal which may be placed on any cistern-room or building, by the duly authorized officers of the revenue, or shall open said lock or seal, or the door to such cistern-room or building, or shall in any manner gain access to the contents therein in the absence of the proper officer, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than three years; and any person who shall use any molasses, beer, or other substance, whether fermented on the premises or elsewhere, for the purpose of producing spirits, before an account for the same shall have been registered in the proper record-book provided for that purpose, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each and every offense so committed.

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any internal revenue officer to detain any cask or package containing, or supposed to contain, distilled spirits, when such officer has reason to believe the tax imposed by law upon the same has not been paid, or that the same is being removed in violation of law; and every such cask or package may be held by such officer at a safe place until it shall be determined whether the property so detained is liable by law to be proceeded against for forfeiture; but such summary detention shall not continue in any case longer than forty-eight hours, without process of law or intervention of the officer to whom such detention is to be reported.

SEC. 42. And be it further enacted, That no distillery nor distilling apparatus seized for any violation of law shall be released to the claimant or any intervening party before judgment, except in case of a distillery for which the special tax has been paid, and which has a registered producing capacity of one hundred and fifty proof gallons, or more, per day, on showing by sufficient affidavits that there are hogs or other live stock, not less than fifty head in number, depending for their feed on the products of said distillery which would suffer injury if the business of such distillery is stopped; such distillery in that case may be released to the claimant, or any other intervening party, at the discretion of the court, on a bond to be given and approved in open court with two or more sureties for the full appraised value of all the property seized, which value shall be ascertained by three competent appraisers to be designated and appointed by the court. In case of the seizure of and judgment of forfeiture against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits having a registered producing capacity of less than one hundred and fifty gallons per day, or of any distillery for the non-payment of the special tax, the still, stills, doubler, worm, worm-tub, and all mash-tubs and fermenting-tubs shall be so destroyed as to prevent the use of the same or any part thereof for the purpose of distilling; and the materials shall be sold as in case of other forfeited property.

SEC. 43. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every person who empties or draws off, or causes to be emptied or drawn off, any distilled spirits from a cask or package bearing any mark, brand, or stamp required by law, at the time of emptying such cask or package, to efface and obliterate said mark, stamp, or brand. Any such cask or package from which said mark, brand, and stamp is not so effaced and obliterated, as herein required, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized by any officer of internal revenue wherever found. Any railroad company or other transportation company, or person, who shall receive or transport, or have in possession with intent to transport, or with intent to cause or procure to be transported, any such empty cask or package, or any part thereof, having thereon any brand, mark, or stamp, required by law to be placed on any cask or package containing distilled spirits, shall forfeit three hundred dollars for each such cask or package, or any part thereof, so received or transported, or had in possession with the intent aforesaid; and any boat, railroad car, cart, dray, wagon, or other vehicle, and all horses or other animals used in carrying or transporting the same, shall be forfeited to the United States. Any person who shall fail or neglect to efface and obliterate said mark, stamp, or brand at the time of emptying such cask or package, or who shall receive any such cask or package, or any part thereof, with the intent aforesaid, or who shall transport the same, or knowingly aid or assist therein, or who shall remove any stamp provided by this act from any cask or package containing or which had contained distilled spirits, without defacing and destroying the same at the time of such removal, or who shall aid or assist therein, or who shall have in his possession any such stamp so removed, as aforesaid, or have in his possession any canceled stamp or any stamp which has been used, or which purports to have been used, upon any cask or package of distilled spirits, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than ten thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than five years.

SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall carry on the business of a distiller, rectifier, compounder of liquors, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer, or manufacturer of stills, without having paid the special tax, as required by law, or who shall carry on the business of a distiller without having given bond as required by law, or who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller, with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years. And all distilled spirits or wines, and all stills or other apparatus, fit or intended to be used for the distillation or rectification of spirits or for the compounding of liquors, owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the distillery or rectifying establishment, or in the store or other place of business of the compounder, or in any building, room, yard, or inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises; and all the right, title, and interest of such person in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated, and all right, title, and interest therein of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or has connived at the same; and all personal property owned by or in possession of any person who has permitted or suffered any building, yard, or inclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery which shall be found in any such building, yard, or inclosure, and all the right, title, and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 45. And be it further enacted, That every rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, and compounder of liquors shall provide himself with a book, to be prepared and kept in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall, on the same day on which he receives any spirits, and before he shall draw off any part thereof, or add water or anything thereto, or in any respect alter the same, enter in such book, and in the proper columns respectively prepared for the purpose, the date when, the name of the person or firm from whom, and the place whence the spirits were received, by whom distilled, rectified, or compounded, and when and by whom inspected, and, if in the original package, the serial number of each package, the number of wine gallons and proof gallons, the kind of spirit, and the number and kind of adhesive stamps thereon; and every such rectifier, compounder, and wholesale dealer shall, at the time of sending out of his stock or possession any spirits, and before the same shall be removed from his premises, enter, in like manner, in the said book, the day when, and the name and place of business of the person or firm to whom such spirits are to be sent, the quantity and the kind or quality of such spirits, and also the number of gallons and fractions of a gallon at proof; and, if in the original packages in which they were received, he shall enter the name of the distiller and the serial number of the package. And every such book shall be at all times kept in some public or open place on the premises of such rectifier, wholesale dealer, or compounder of liquors, respectively, for inspection; and any revenue officer may make an examination of such book and take an abstract therefrom; and every such book, when it has been filled up as aforesaid, shall be preserved by such rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, for a period not less than two years; and during such time it shall be produced by him to every revenue officer demanding the same; and if any rectifier, wholesale dealer, or compounder of liquors shall refuse or neglect to provide such book or to make entries therein as aforesaid, or shall cancel, alter, obliterate, or destroy any part of such book, or any entry therein, or make any false entry therein, or hinder or obstruct any revenue officer from examining such book or making any entry therein, or taking any abstract therefrom; or if such book shall not be preserved or not produced by any rectifier, or wholesale dealer, or compounder, as hereinbefore directed, he shall pay a penalty of one hundred dollars, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

SEC. 46. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any rectifier of distilled spirits, compounder of liquors, liquor dealer, wholesale or retail liquor dealer to purchase or receive any distilled spirits in quantities greater than twenty gallons from any person other than an authorized rectifier of distilled spirits, compounder of liquors, distiller, or wholesale liquor dealer. Any person violating this section shall forfeit and pay one thousand dollars: Provided, That this shall not be held to apply to judicial sales, nor to sales at public auction made by an auctioneer who has paid a special tax as such.

SEC. 47. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits drawn from any cask or other package, and placed in any other cask or package containing not less than ten gallons, and intended for sale, shall be again inspected and gauged, and the cask or package into which it is so transferred shall be marked or branded, and such marking and branding shall distinctly indicate the name of the gauger, the time and place of inspection, the proof of the spirits, the particular name of such spirits as known to the trade, together with the name and place of business of the dealer, rectifier, or compounder, as the case may be; and in all cases, except where such spirits have been rectified, or compounded, the name also of the distiller, and the distillery where such spirits were produced, and the serial number of the original package; and the absence of such mark or brand shall be taken and held as sufficient cause and evidence for the forfeiture of such unmarked packages of spirits.

SEC. 48. And be it further enacted, That on all wines, liquors, or compounds known or denominated as wine, and made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, but not made from grapes grown in the United States, and on all liquors not made from grapes, currants, rhubarb, or berries grown in the United States, but produced by being rectified or mixed with distilled spirits or by the infusion of any matter in spirits, to be sold as wine or by any other name, there shall be levied and paid a tax of six dollars per dozen bottles, each bottle containing more than one pint and not more than one quart; or three dollars per dozen bottles, each bottle containing [not] more than one pint, and at the same rate for any quantity of such merchandise, however the same may be put up or whatever be the package. And any person manufacturing, compounding, or putting up such wines, shall, without previous demand, make return, under oath or affirmation, to the assistant assessor, on the first and fifteenth day of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, of the entire amount of such wines manufactured and sold or put up and sold during the first fifteen days of the month and the residue of the month, respectively, except when the wines so manufactured or put up are used exclusively by the family of the person manufacturing the same; and the tax herein imposed shall be payable at the time such return is made. And in case such manufacturer shall neglect or refuse to make such return within the time specified, the assessor shall proceed to ascertain the amount of tax due, as provided in other cases of a refusal or neglect to make returns, and shall assess the tax, and add a penalty of fifty per centum to the amount; which said tax and also said penalty shall be collected in the manner provided for the collection of tax on monthly and other lists. Any person who shall fraudulently evade or attempt to evade the payment of the tax herein imposed shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 49. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, may appoint not exceeding twenty-five officers, to be called supervisors of internal revenue, each one of whom shall be assigned to a designated territorial district to be composed of one or more judicial districts and Territories, and shall keep his office at some convenient place in his district to be designated by the Commissioner, and shall receive in addition to expenses necessarily incurred by him and allowed and certified by the said Commissioner as a compensation for his services such salary as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may deem just and reasonable, not exceeding three thousand dollars per annum. It shall be the duty of every supervisor of internal revenue, under the direction of the Commissioner, to see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes are faithfully executed and complied with; to aid in the prevention, detection, and punishment of any frauds in relation thereto, and to examine into the efficiency and conduct of all officers of internal revenue within his district; and for such purposes he shall have power to examine all persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, and to administer oaths, and to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as assessors may do. It shall be the duty of every supervisor of internal revenue as aforesaid to report in writing to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any neglect of duty, incompetency, delinquency, or malfeasance in office of any internal revenue officer within his district of which he may obtain knowledge, with a statement of all the facts in each case, and any evidence sustaining the same; and he shall have power to transfer any inspector, gauger, or storekeeper from one distillery or other place of duty to another, or from one collection district to another, within his district, and may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any such inspector, gauger, or storekeeper, and in case of suspension shall immediately notify the collector of the proper district and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and within three days thereafter make report of his action, and his reasons therefor, in writing, to said Commissioner, who shall thereupon take such further action as he may deem proper.

SEC. 50. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power, whenever in his judgment the necessities of the service may require, to employ competent detectives, not exceeding twenty-five in number at any one time, to be paid under the provisions of the seventh section of the "Act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, and he may, at his discretion, assign any such detective to duty under the direction of any supervisor of internal revenue, or to such other special duty as he may deem necessary, and that from and after the passage of this act no general or special agent, or inspector, by whatever name or designation he may be known, of the Treasury Department in connection with the internal revenue, except inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and except as provided for in this act, shall be appointed, commissioned, employed, or continued in office, and the term of office or employment of all such general or special agents or inspectors now authorized as aforesaid under employment at the time of the passage of this act shall expire ten days after this act shall take effect.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 51. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no assessor or collector shall be detailed or authorized to discharge any duty imposed by law on any other collector or assessor, but a supervisor of internal revenue may, within his territorial district, suspend any collector or assessor for fraud, or gross neglect of duty, or abuse of power, and shall immediately report his action to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with his reasons therefor in writing, who shall thereupon take such further action as he may deem proper.

SEC. 52. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury such number of internal revenue storekeepers as may be necessary, the compensation of each of whom shall be determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, not exceeding five dollars per day, to be paid by the United States, one or more of whom shall be assigned by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to every bonded or distillery warehouse established by law; and no such storekeeper shall be engaged in any other business while in the service of the United States without the written permission of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Every storekeeper shall take an oath faithfully to perform the duties of his office, and shall give a bond, to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the faithful discharge of his duties, in such form and for such amount as the Commissioner may prescribe. Every storekeeper shall have charge of the warehouse to which he may be assigned, under the direction of the collector controlling the same, which warehouse shall be in the joint custody of such storekeeper and the proprietor thereof, and kept securely locked, and shall at no time be unlocked and opened, or remain open, unless in the presence of such storekeeper or other person who may be designated to act for him as hereinafter provided; and no articles shall be received in or delivered from such warehouse except on an order or permit addressed to the storekeeper and signed by the collector having control of the warehouse. Every storekeeper shall keep a warehouse book, which shall at all times be open to the examination of any revenue officer, in which he shall enter an account of all articles deposited in the warehouse to which he is assigned, indicating in each case the date of the deposit, by whom manufactured or produced, the number and description of the packages and contents, the quantities therein, the marks and serial numbers thereon, and by whom gauged, inspected, or weighed, and if distilled spirits, the number of gauge or wine gallons and of proof gallons; and before delivering any article from the warehouse he shall enter in said book the date of the permit or order of the collector for the delivery of such articles, the number and description of the packages, the marks and serial numbers thereon, the date of delivery, to whom delivered, and for what purpose, which purpose shall be specified in the permit or order for delivery; and in case of delivery of any distilled spirits the number of gauge or wine gallons, and of proof gallons, shall also be stated; and such further particulars shall be entered in the warehouse books as may be prescribed or found necessary for the identification of the packages, to insure the correct delivery thereof and proper accountability thereof [therefor.] A daily return shall be furnished by every storekeeper to the collector of the district of all articles received in and delivered from the warehouse during the day preceding that on which the return is made, a copy of which shall be mailed by him at the same time to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and each storekeeper shall, on the first Monday of every month, make a report in triplicate of the number of packages of all articles, with the several descriptions thereof respectively, as above provided, which remained in the warehouse at the date of his last report, and of all articles received therein and delivered therefrom during the preceding month, and of all articles remaining therein at the end of said month; one of which reports shall be by him delivered to the assessor of the district, to be recorded and filed in his office; one delivered to the collector having control of the warehouse, to be recorded and filed in his office; and one transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be recorded and filed in his office. Any internal revenue storekeeper may be transferred by the supervisor of the district or by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from one warehouse to any other. In case of the absence of any internal revenue storekeeper by sickness or from any other cause the collector having control of the warehouse may designate a person to have temporary charge of such warehouse, who shall, during such absence, perform the duties and receive the pay of the storekeeper for the time he may be so employed; and for any violation of the law he shall be subject to the same punishment as storekeepers. Any storekeeper or other person in the employment of the United States having charge of a bonded warehouse, who shall remove or allow to be removed any cask or other package therefrom without an order or permit of the collector, or which has not been marked or stamped in the manner required by law, or shall remove or allow to be removed any part of the contents of any cask or package deposited therein, shall be immediately dismissed from office or employment, and, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than two thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

SEC. 53. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in every collection district where the same may be necessary, one or more internal revenue gaugers, who shall each take an oath faithfully to perform his duties, and shall give his bond, with one or more sureties, satisfactory to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the faithful discharge of the duties assigned to him by law or regulations; and the penal sum of said bond shall not be less than five thousand dollars, and said bond shall be renewed or strengthened as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require. The duties of every such gauger shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the collector of the district to which he may be assigned, or of the collector in charge of exports at any port of entry to which he may be assigned. Fees for gauging and inspecting shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be paid to the collector by the owner or producer of the articles to be gauged and inspected; and said collector shall retain all amounts so received as such fees until the last day of each month, when the aggregate amount of fees so paid that month shall, under regulation to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be paid to the gauger or gaugers performing the duty. In no case, however, shall the aggregate monthly fees of any gauger exceed the rate of three thousand dollars per annum. All necessary labor and expense attending the gauging of any article shall be borne by the owner or producer of such articles. Every gauger shall, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, make a daily return, in duplicate; one to be delivered to the assessor and the other to the collector of his district, giving a true account, in detail, of all articles gauged and proved or inspected by him, and for whom, and the number and kind of stamps used by him. Any gauger who shall make any false or fraudulent inspection, gauging, or proof, shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

SEC. 54. And be it further enacted, That a drawback shall be allowed upon alcohol and rum exported to foreign countries on which taxes have been paid under the provisions of this act when exported as herein provided for. The drawback allowed shall include the taxes levied and paid upon the alcohol or rum exported, not, however, exceeding sixty cents per gallon proof-spirits, which shall be due and payable only after the proper entries and bonds have been executed and filed and all other conditions complied with as hereinafter required, and thirty days after the vessel has actually cleared and sailed on her voyage with such spirits on board; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe such rules and regulations in relation thereto as may be necessary to secure the Treasury of the United States against frauds. And if any person shall fraudulently claim or seek to obtain an allowance of drawback on any alcohol or rum, or shall fraudulently claim any greater allowance or drawback than the tax actually paid thereon, such person shall forfeit and pay to the Government of the United States triple the amount wrongfully and fraudulently sought to be obtained, and, on conviction, shall be imprisoned not less than one year nor more than ten years. And any owner, agent, or master of any vessel who shall knowingly aid or abet in the fraudulent collection or fraudulent attempt to collect any drawback upon rum or alcohol, or shall knowingly aid or permit any fraudulent change in the spirits so shipped, shall, on conviction, be fined five thousand dollars and imprisoned not less than one year, and the ship or vessel on board of which such shipment was made, or pretended to be made, shall be forfeited to the United States, whether a conviction of the master or owner be had or otherwise, and proceedings may be had in admiralty by libel for such forfeiture.

SEC. 55. And be it further enacted, That alcohol and rum may be exported with the privilege of drawback, in quantities not less than two thousand gallons, and in packages containing not less than thirty gallons each, on application of the owner thereof to the collector of customs at any port of entry, and under such rules and regulations, and after making such entries, and executing such bonds, and giving such other additional security, as may be prescribed by law and by the Secretary of the Treasury. The entry for such exportation shall be in triplicate, and shall contain the name of the person applying to export, the name of the distiller, and of the district in which the spirits were distilled, and the name of the vessel by which, and the name of the port to which, they are to be exported; and the form of the entry shall be as follows:

Export Entry of Distilled Spirits entitled to Drawback.

Entry of spirits distilled by ———, in ——— district, State of ———, to be exported by ——— in the ———, whereof ——— is master, bound to ———.

And the entry shall specify the whole number of casks or packages, the marks and serial numbers thereon, the quality or kind of spirits as known in commerce, the number of gauge or wine gallons and of proof gallons; and [the] amount of the tax on such spirits shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the owner of the spirits, and that the tax has been paid thereon, and that they are truly intended to be exported to the port of —, and not to be re-landed within the limits of the United States; and said owner shall give his bond executed in duplicate, with one or more sureties satisfactory to said collector, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will export the spirits as specified in said entry to the port of —, and that the same shall not be landed within the jurisdiction of the United States. The penal sum named in said bond shall be equal to not less than double the amount of the drawback on such spirits. For the discharge of any such export bond the same time shall be allowed, and the same certificates of landing and other evidence shall be required as is or may be provided and required for imported merchandise exported from the United States, that the said spirits have been landed at the port named, or at any other port, beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. One bill of lading, duly signed by the master of the vessel, shall be deposited with said collector, to be filed at his office with the entry retained by him; one of said entries shall be, when the shipment is completed, transmitted, with the duplicate of the bond, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be recorded and filed in his office. The lading on board said vessel shall be only after the receipt of an order or permit signed by the collector of customs and directed to a customs gauger, and after each cask or package shall have been distinctly marked or branded, by said gauger, as follows: "For export from U. S. A." The casks or packages shall be inspected and gauged alongside of or on the vessel by the gauger, designated by said collector, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and on application of the said collector, it shall be the duty of the surveyor of the port to designate and direct one of the custom-house inspectors to superintend such shipment. The gauger, as aforesaid, shall make a full return of such inspecting and gauging, certifying thereon that the shipment has been made in his presence, on board the vessel named in the entry for export, which return shall be indorsed by said custom-house inspector, certifying that the casks or packages have been shipped under his supervision on board said vessel; and the said inspector shall make a similar certificate to the surveyor of the port, indorsed on, or to be attached to, the entry in possession of the custom-house: Provided, however, That no claim for drawback shall be allowed on either of the said articles which shall have been exported as aforesaid prior to the time at which this act shall take effect.

SEC. 56. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits in any bonded warehouse shall within nine months after the passage of this act be withdrawn from such warehouse, and the taxes paid on the same; and the casks or packages containing said spirits shall be marked and stamped and be subject in all respects to the same requirements as if manufactured after the passage of this act. And any distilled spirits remaining in any bonded warehouse for a period of more than nine months after the passage of this act shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be sold or disposed of for the benefit of the same in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. And whenever in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any distillery or other warehouse shall become unsafe or unfit for use, or the merchandise therein shall for any reason be liable to loss or great wastage, the Commissioner may discontinue such warehouse, and require that the merchandise therein shall be transferred to such other warehouse as may be designated by him within such time as he shall prescribe. Such transfer shall be made under the supervision of the collector, or such other officer as may be designated by the Commissioner; and the expense thereof shall be paid by the owner of the merchandise; and if the owner of such merchandise shall fail to make such transfer within the time prescribed, or to pay the just and proper expense of such transfer, as ascertained and determined by the Commissioner, such merchandise may be seized and sold by the collector, in the same manner as goods are sold upon distraint for taxes, and the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the payment of the taxes due thereon and the costs and expenses of such sale and removal, and the balance paid over to the owner of such merchandise.

SEC. 57. And be it further enacted, That any person owning, or having in his possession, any distilled spirits intended for sale, exceeding in quantity fifty gallons, and not in a bonded warehouse at the time when this act takes effect, shall immediately make a return, under oath, to the collector of the district wherein such spirits may be held, stating the number and kind of packages, together with the marks and brands thereon, and the place where the same are stored, together with the quantity of spirits, as nearly as the owner can determine the same. Upon the receipt of such return the collector, being first satisfied that the tax on said spirits has been paid, shall immediately cause the same to be gauged and proved by an internal revenue gauger, who shall mark, by cutting, the contents and proof on each cask or package containing five wine gallons or more, and shall affix and cancel an engraved stamp thereon, which stamp shall be as follows:

Stamp for stock on hand. No. —.
Issued by —.

Collector of — district, State of —.
Distilled spirits. Tax paid prior to (here engrave the date when this takes effect,) — proof gallons. Gauged —, 18—. —, Gauger.

All distilled spirits owned or held by any person, as aforesaid, shall be included in the same return, and the gauging shall be continuous until all the spirits owned or held by such person are gauged and stamped, as aforesaid, and a report thereof in duplicate shall immediately be made by the gauger to the collector and assessor of the district showing the number of packages, contents, and proof of each package gauged and stamped, and one of said reports shall be transmitted by the collector to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. No such spirits shall be gauged or stamped in any cistern or other stationary vessel. Any person owning, or having in possession, such spirits and refusing or neglecting to make such return shall forfeit the same; and all distilled spirits found, after thirty days from the time this act takes effect, in any cask or package containing more than five gallons, without having thereon each mark and stamp required therefor by this act, shall be forfeited to the United States. Any person who shall gauge, mark, or stamp any cask or package of distilled spirits under the provisions of this section, or who shall cause or procure the same to be done, knowing that the same were manufactured or removed from warehouse subsequent to the taking effect of this act, or that the taxes thereon have not been paid, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. All stamps required by this section shall be prepared, issued, and affixed upon casks and packages and canceled in the same manner as provided for other stamps for distilled spirits in this act, and shall be charged at the rate of twenty-five cents for each stamp.

SEC. 58. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits forfeited to the United States sold by order of court or under process of distraint shall be sold subject to tax; and the purchaser shall immediately, and before he takes possession of said spirits, pay the tax thereon. And any distilled spirits condemned before the passage of this act, and in the possession of the United States, shall be sold as herein provided. And if any tax-paid stamps are affixed to any cask or package so condemned, such stamps shall be obliterated and destroyed by the collector or marshal after forfeiture and before such sale.

SEC. 59. And be it further enacted, That the following special taxes shall be, and are hereby, imposed, that is to say:

Distillers producing one hundred barrels, or less, of distilled spirits, counting forty gallons of proof-spirits to the barrel, within the year, shall each pay four hundred dollars; and if producing more than one hundred barrels, shall pay in addition four dollars for each such barrel produced in excess of one hundred barrels. And monthly returns of the number of barrels of spirits, as before described, distilled by him, shall be made by each distiller in the same manner as monthly returns of sales are made. Every person who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who by any process of vaporization separates alcoholic spirit from any fermented substance, or who making or keeping mash, wort, or wash, has also in his possession or use a still, shall be regarded as a distiller: Provided, That a like tax of four dollars on each barrel, counting forty gallons of proof-spirits to the barrel, shall be assessed and collected from the owner of any distilled spirits which may be in any bonded warehouse at the date of the taking effect of this act, to be paid whenever the same shall be withdrawn from such warehouse, under the provisions of the sixty-second [fifty-sixth] section of this act: Provided, That no tax shall be imposed for any still, stills, or other apparatus used by druggists and chemists for the recovery of alcohol for pharmaceutical and chemical or scientific purposes which has been used in those processes.

Rectifiers of distilled spirits, rectifying, purifying, or refining two hundred barrels or less of distilled spirits, counting forty gallons of proof-spirits to the barrel, within the year, shall each pay two hundred dollars, and shall pay fifty cents for each such barrel produced in excess of two hundred barrels. And monthly returns of the quantity and proof of all the spirits purchased and of the number of barrels of spirits, as before described, rectified, purified, or refined by him, shall be made by each rectifier in the same manner as monthly returns of sales are made. Every person who rectifies, purifies, or refines distilled spirits or wines by any process, and every wholesale or retail liquor dealer or compounder of liquors who has in his possession any still or leach-tub, or who shall keep any other apparatus for the purpose of refining in any manner distilled spirits, shall be regarded as a rectifier.

Compounders of liquors shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person who, without rectifying, purifying, or refining distilled spirits, shall, by mixing such spirits, wine, or other liquor with any materials, manufacture any spurious, imitation, or compound liquors, for sale under the name of whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, spirits, cordials, or wine biters, or any other name, shall be regarded as a compounder of liquors.

Retail dealers in liquors shall pay twenty-five dollars. Every person who shall sell or offer for sale foreign or domestic spirits, wine, ale, beer, or other malt liquors, and whose annual sales, including all sales of other merchandise, do not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in liquors.

Laws of the United States.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Wholesale liquor dealers, whose annual sales do not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, shall pay one hundred dollars; and if exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, shall each pay in addition ten dollars for every one thousand dollars of sales of such spirits, wines, or liquors in excess of twenty-five thousand, and on other sales shall pay as wholesale dealers; and such excess shall be assessed and paid in the same manner as required of wholesale dealers. Every person who sells or offers for sale distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors, whose annual sales shall exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer. But no distiller or brewer, who has paid his special tax as such, and who sells only distilled spirits or malt liquors of his own production, at the place of manufacture, in the original casks or packages in which they are placed for the purpose of affixing the tax stamps, shall be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer. But the payment of any special tax imposed by this act shall not be held or construed to exempt any person carrying on any trade, business, or profession from any penalty or punishment therefor provided by the laws of any State; nor to authorize the commencement or continuance of any such trade, business, or profession, contrary to the laws of any State, or in places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held or construed to prohibit or prevent any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade, business, or profession for State or other purposes.

Manufacturers of stills shall each pay fifty dollars, and twenty dollars for each still or worm for distilling made by him. Any person who manufactures any still or worm to be used in distilling shall be deemed a manufacturer of stills.

TOBACCO, SNUFF, AND CIGARS.

Dealers in leaf tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed ten thousand dollars, shall each pay twenty-five dollars; and if their annual sales exceed ten thousand dollars, shall pay in addition two dollars for every thousand dollars in excess of ten thousand dollars. Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is for himself, or on commission, to sell or offer for sale leaf tobacco. And payment of a special tax as wholesale dealer, tobacconist, manufacturer of cigars, or manufacturer of tobacco, shall not exempt any person dealing in leaf tobacco from the payment of the special tax therefor hereby required. But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production, or tobacco received by him as rent from tenants who have produced the same on his land.

Dealers in tobacco, whose annual sales exceed one hundred dollars and do not exceed one thousand dollars, shall each pay five dollars; and when their annual sales exceed one thousand dollars, shall pay in addition two dollars for each thousand dollars in excess of one thousand dollars. Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall be regarded as a dealer in tobacco. And any retail dealer, liquor dealer, or keeper of a hotel, inn, tavern, or eating-house, who sells tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall pay, in addition to his special tax, the special tax as a dealer in tobacco.

Manufacturers of tobacco shall each pay ten dollars; and in addition thereto, where the amount of the penal sum of the bond of such manufacturer, required by this act to be given, shall exceed the sum of five thousand dollars, two dollars for each thousand dollars in excess of five thousand dollars of such penal sum. Every person whose business it is to manufacture tobacco or snuff for himself, or who shall employ others to manufacture tobacco or snuff, whether such manufacture shall be by cutting, pressing, grinding, crushing, or rubbing of any leaf or raw tobacco, or otherwise preparing raw or leaf tobacco or manufactured or partially manufactured tobacco or snuff, or the putting up for use or consumption of scraps, waste, clippings, stems, or deposits of tobacco, resulting from any process of handling tobacco, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of tobacco. But no manufacturer of tobacco shall be required to pay the special tax as a dealer in tobacco for selling the products of his own manufacture.

Manufacturers of cigars, whose annual sales shall not exceed five thousand dollars, shall each pay ten dollars, and when their annual sales exceed five thousand dollars, shall pay in addition two dollars for each thousand dollars in excess of five thousand dollars. Every person whose business it is to make or manufacture cigars for himself, or who shall employ others to make or manufacture cigars, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of cigars. No special tax receipt shall be issued to any manufacturer of cigars until he shall have given the bond required by law. Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker shall cause his name and residence to be registered, without previous demand, with the assistant assessor of the division in which such cigar-maker shall be employed; and any manufacturer of cigars employing any cigar-maker who shall have neglected or refused to make such registry shall, on conviction, be fined five dollars for each day that such cigar-maker so offending by neglect or refusal to register shall be employed by him.

SEC. 60. And be it further enacted, That in every case where it becomes necessary to ascertain the amount of annual or monthly sales made by any person on whom a special tax is imposed by this act, or to ascertain the excess of such sales above a given amount, such amounts and excesses shall be ascertained and returned under such regulations and in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and in any case where the amount of the tax has been increased by this act above the amount before paid by any person in that behalf, such person, except retail dealers, shall be again assessed and pay the amount of such increase from the taking effect of this act; and in any case where the amount of sales or receipts has been understated or underestimated by any person, such person shall be again assessed for such deficiency, and shall be required to pay the same with any penalty or penalties that may by law have accrued or be chargeable thereon.

SEC. 61. And be it further enacted, That upon tobacco and snuff which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected the following taxes:

On snuff, manufactured of tobacco or any substitute for tobacco, ground, dry, damp, pickled, scented, or otherwise, of all descriptions, when prepared for use, a tax of thirty-two cents per pound. And snuff flour, when sold, or removed for use or consumption, shall be taxed as snuff, and shall be put up in packages and stamped in the same manner as snuff.

On all chewing tobacco, fine-cut, plug, or twist; on all tobacco twisted by hand, or reduced from leaf into a condition to be consumed, or otherwise prepared, without the use of any machine or instrument, and without being pressed or sweetened; and on all other kinds of manufactured tobacco, not herein otherwise provided for, a tax of thirty-two cents per pound.

On all smoking tobacco exclusively of stems, or of leaf, with all the stems in and so sold, the leaf not having been previously stripped, butted, or rolled, and from which no part of the stems have been separated by sifting, stripping, dressing, or in any other manner, either before, during, or after the process of manufacturing; on all fine-cut shorts, the refuse of fine-cut chewing tobacco which has passed through a riddle of thirty-six meshes to the square inch by process of sifting; and on all refuse scraps and sweepings of tobacco, a tax of sixteen cents per pound.

SEC. 62. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act all manufactured tobacco shall be put up and prepared by the manufacturer for sale, or removal for sale or consumption, in packages of the following description, and in no other manner:

All snuff in packages containing one, two, four, six, eight, and sixteen ounces, or in bladders containing not exceeding ten pounds each; or in jars containing not exceeding twenty pounds.

All fine-cut chewing tobacco, and all other kinds of tobacco not otherwise provided for, in packages containing one half, one, two, four, eight, and sixteen ounces, except that fine-cut chewing tobacco may, at the option of the manufacturer, be put up in wooden packages containing ten, twenty, forty, and sixty pounds each.

All smoking tobacco, all fine-cut shorts which has passed through a riddle of thirty-six meshes to the square inch, and all refuse scraps and sweepings of tobacco, in packages containing two, four, eight, and sixteen ounces each.

All cavendish, plug, and twist tobacco in wooden packages not exceeding two hundred pounds net weight.

And every such wooden package shall have printed or marked thereon the manufacturer's name and place of manufacture or the proprietor's name and his trade mark and the registered number of the manufactory, and the gross weight, the tare, and the net weight of the tobacco in each package: Provided, That these limitations and descriptions of packages shall not apply to tobacco and snuff transported in bond for exportation and actually exported.

SEC. 63. And be it further enacted, That every person before commencing, or, if already commenced, before continuing the manufacture of tobacco or snuff, shall, in addition to a compliance with all other provisions of law, furnish, without previous demand therefor, to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district where the manufacture is to be carried on, a statement, in duplicate, subscribed under oath or affirmation, accurately setting forth the place, and if in a city, the street and number of the street where the manufacture is to be carried on; the number of cutting machines, presses, snuff mills, hand mills, or other machines; the name, kind, and quality of the article manufactured, or proposed to be manufactured; and, if the same shall be manufactured for, or to be sold and delivered to, any other person, as agent, or under a special contract, the name and residence and business or occupation of the person for whom the said article is to be manufactured, or to whom it is to be delivered; and shall give a bond in conformity with the provisions of this act, to be approved by the collector of the district, in the sum of two thousand dollars, with an addition to said sum of three thousand dollars for each cutting machine kept for use, of one thousand dollars for each screw-press kept for use in making plug or pressed tobacco, of five thousand dollars for each hydraulic press kept for use, of one thousand dollars for each snuff mill kept for use, and of one thousand dollars for each hand mill, or other mill or machine, kept for the grinding, cutting, or crushing of tobacco; that he will not engage in any attempt, by himself or by collusion with others, to defraud the Government of any tax on his manufactures; that he will render truly and correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed by law or regulations; that whenever he shall add to the number of cutting machines, presses, snuff mills, hand mills, or other mills or machines as aforesaid, he will immediately give notice thereof to the collector of the district; that he will stamp, in accordance with law, all tobacco and snuff manufactured by him before he removes any part thereof from the place of manufacture; that he will not knowingly sell, purchase, expose, or receive for sale any manufactured tobacco or snuff which has not been stamped as required by law; and that he will comply with all the requirements of law relating to the manufacture of tobacco or snuff. And the sum of the said bond may be increased from time to time, and additional sureties required by the collector, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And every manufacturer shall obtain a certificate from the collector of the district, who is hereby authorized and directed to issue the same, setting forth the kind and number of machines, presses, snuff mills, hand mills, or other mills and machines, as aforesaid, for which the bond has been given, which certificate shall be posted in a conspicuous place within the manufactory. And any tobacco manufacturer who shall neglect or refuse to obtain such certificate, or to keep the same posted as hereinbefore provided, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars. And any person manufacturing tobacco or snuff of any description without first giving bond as herein required, shall on conviction be fined not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years. And the working or preparation of any leaf tobacco, or tobacco stems, scraps, clippings, or waste, by sifting, twisting, screening, or any other process, shall be deemed manufacturing.

SEC. 64. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act every manufacturer of tobacco and snuff shall place and keep on the side or end of the building within which his business is carried on, so that it can be distinctly seen, a sign, with letters thereon not less than three inches in length, painted in oil colors or gilded, giving his full name and business. Any person neglecting to comply with the requirements of this section shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars.

SEC. 65. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every assistant assessor to keep a record, in a book or books to be provided for the purpose, to be open to the inspection of any person, of the name and residence of every person engaged in the manufacture of tobacco or snuff in his division, the place where such manufacture is carried on, and the number of the manufactory; and the assistant assessor shall enter in said record, under the name of each manufacturer, a copy of every inventory required by this act to be made by such manufacturer, and an abstract of his monthly returns; and each assessor shall keep a similar record for the district, and shall cause the several manufactories of tobacco or snuff in his district to be numbered consecutively, which numbers shall not thereafter be changed.

SEC. 66. And be it further enacted, That every person, now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of tobacco or snuff, shall make and deliver to the assistant assessor of the division a true inventory, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the quantity of each of the different kinds of tobacco, snuff flour, snuff, stems, scraps, clippings, waste, tinfoil, licorice, sugar, gum, and other materials held or owned by him on the first day of January of each year, or at the time of commencing and at the time of concluding business, if before or after the first of January, setting forth what portion of said goods and materials, and what kinds, were manufactured or produced by him, and what was purchased from others; which inventory shall be verified by his oath or affirmation; and the assistant assessor shall make personal examination of the stock sufficient to satisfy himself as to the correctness of the inventory, and shall verify the fact of such examination by oath or affirmation taken before the assessor, to be indorsed on or affixed to the inventory; and every such person shall keep a book or books, the forms of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and enter therein daily an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid purchased by him, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, and snuff flour, stems, scraps, clippings, waste, tinfoil, licorice, sugar, gum, and other materials, of whatever description, whether manufactured, (and if plug tobacco the number of net pounds of lumps made in the lump-room, and the number of packages and pounds produced in the press-room each day,) sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture in bond, and to what district; and shall, on or before the tenth day of each and every month, furnish to the assistant assessor of the division a true and accurate abstract from such book of all such purchases, sales, and removals, made during the month next preceding, which abstract shall be verified by his oath or affirmation; and in case of refusal or willful neglect to deliver the inventory, or keep the account, or furnish the abstract aforesaid, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. And it shall be the duty of any dealer in leaf tobacco, or in any material used in manufacturing tobacco or snuff, on demand of any officer of internal revenue to render a true and correct statement, verified by oath or affirmation, of the quantity and amount of such leaf tobacco or material sold or delivered to any person named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or if there is cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the assessor shall make an examination of persons, books, and papers, in the same manner as provided in this act in relation to frauds and evasions.

SEC. 67. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable and special revenue stamps for payment of the tax on tobacco and snuff, which stamps shall indicate the weight and class of the article on which payment is to be made, and shall be affixed and canceled in the mode prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and stamps when used on any wooden package shall be canceled by sinking a portion of the same into the wood with a steel die; also such warehouse stamps as are required by this act, which stamps shall be furnished to the collectors of internal revenue requiring the same, who shall each keep at all times a supply equal in amount to three months' sales thereof, and shall sell the same only to the manufacturers of tobacco and snuff in their respective districts who have given bonds as required by law, to owners or consignees of tobacco or snuff, upon the requisition of the proper custom-house officer having the custody of such tobacco or snuff, and to persons required by law to affix the same to tobacco or snuff on hand on the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-nine; and every collector shall keep an account of the number, amount, and denominate values of stamps sold by him to each manufacturer, and to other persons above described.

SEC. 68. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of tobacco or snuff shall, in addition to all other requirements of this act relating to tobacco, print on each package or securely affix, by pasting on each package containing tobacco or snuff manufactured by or for him, a label on which shall be printed, together with the proprietor's or manufacturer's name, the number of the manufactory, and the district and State in which it is situated, these words:

"NOTICE.—The manufacturer of this tobacco has complied with all the requirements of law. Every person is cautioned, under the penalties of law, not to use this package for tobacco again."

Any manufacturer of tobacco who shall neglect to print on or affix such label to any package containing tobacco made by or for him, or sold or offered for sale by or for him; or any person who shall remove any such label so affixed from any such package, shall, on conviction, be fined fifty dollars for each package in respect to which such offense shall be committed.

SEC. 69. And be it further enacted, That any manufacturer of tobacco or snuff who shall remove otherwise than as provided by law, or sell any tobacco or snuff without the proper stamps denoting the tax thereon, or without having paid the special tax, or given bond as required by law, or who shall make false or fraudulent entries of manufactures or sales of tobacco or snuff, or who shall make false or fraudulent entries of the purchase or sales of leaf tobacco, tobacco stems, or other material, or who shall affix any false, forged, fraudulent, spurious, or counterfeit stamp, or imitation of any stamp required by this act, to any box or package containing any tobacco or snuff, shall, in addition to the penalties elsewhere provided in this act for such offenses, forfeit to the United States all the raw material and manufactured or partly manufactured tobacco and snuff, and all machinery, tools, implements, apparatus, fixtures, boxes and barrels, and all other materials which shall be found in the possession of such person, in the manufactory of such person, or elsewhere.

SEC. 70. And be it further enacted, That the absence of the proper stamp on any package of manufactured tobacco or snuff shall be notice to all persons that the tax has not been paid thereon, and shall be prima facie evidence of the non-payment thereof. And such tobacco or snuff shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 71. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall remove from any manufactory, or from any place where tobacco or snuff is made, any manufactured tobacco or snuff without the same being put up in proper packages, or without the proper stamp for the amount thereon being affixed and canceled, as required by law; or, if intended for export, without the proper warehouse stamp being affixed; or shall use, sell, or offer for sale, or have in possession, except in the manufactory, or in a bonded warehouse, any manufactured tobacco or snuff, without proper stamps being affixed and canceled; or shall sell, or offer for sale, for consumption in the United States, or use, or have in possession, except in the manufactory or in a bonded warehouse, any manufactured tobacco or snuff on which only the warehouse stamp marking the same for export has been affixed, shall, on conviction thereof for each such offense, respectively, be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years. And any person who shall affix to any package containing tobacco or snuff any false, forged, fraudulent, spurious, or counterfeit stamp, or a stamp which has been before used, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than two years nor more than five years.

SEC. 72. And be it further enacted, That whenever any stamped box, bag, vessel, wrapper, or envelope of any kind, containing tobacco or snuff, shall be emptied, the stamped portion thereof shall be destroyed by the person in whose hands the same may be. And any person who shall willfully neglect or refuse so to do shall, for each such offense, on conviction, be fined fifty dollars, and imprisoned not less than ten days nor more than six months. And any person who shall sell or give away, or who shall buy or accept from another, any such empty stamp box, bag, vessel, wrapper, or envelope of any kind, or the stamped portion thereof, shall, for each such offense, on conviction, be fined one hundred dollars, and imprisoned for not less than twenty days and not more than one year. And any manufacturer or other person who shall put tobacco or snuff into any such box, bag, vessel, wrapper, or envelope, the same having been either emptied or partially emptied, shall for each such offense, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, and imprisoned for not less than one nor more than three years.

SEC. 73. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the execution of such bonds as he may prescribe, may designate and establish, at any port of entry in the United States, bonded warehouses for the storage of manufactured tobacco and snuff, in bond, intended for exportation, selecting suitable buildings for such purpose, to be recommended by the collector in charge of exports at such port, to be known as export bonded warehouses, and used exclusively for the storage of manufactured tobacco and snuff in bond. Every such warehouse shall be under the control of the collector of internal revenue in charge of exports at the port where such warehouse is located, and shall be in charge of an internal revenue storekeeper assigned thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. No manufactured tobacco or snuff shall be withdrawn or removed from any bonded warehouse without an order or permit from the collector in charge of exports at such port, which shall be issued only for the immediate transfer to a vessel by which such tobacco or snuff is to be exported to a foreign country, as hereinafter provided, or after the tax has been paid thereon. And such warehouse shall be under such further regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe. Any manufactured tobacco and snuff may be withdrawn once, and no more, from an export bonded warehouse for transportation to any other port of entry in the United States where an export bonded warehouse for the storage of manufactured tobacco and snuff may have been established, and such manufactured tobacco and snuff so withdrawn shall, on its arrival at the second port of entry, be immediately warehoused in an export bonded warehouse for the storage of manufactured tobacco and snuff, from which it shall be withdrawn only as provided by law.

SEC. 74. And be it further enacted, That manufactured tobacco and snuff may be removed in bond from the manufactory, without payment of the tax, to be transported directly to an export bonded warehouse for the storage of manufactured tobacco or snuff established at a port of entry as hereinbefore provided; and the deposit in and withdrawal from any bonded warehouse, the transportation and exportation of manufactured tobacco and snuff, shall be made under such rules and regulations and after making such entries and executing such bonds and giving such other additional security as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which shall in all respects, so far as applicable, conform to the provisions of law and regulations relating to distilled spirits to be deposited in or withdrawn from bonded warehouse or transported or exported. All tobacco and snuff intended for export, before being removed from the manufactory shall have affixed to each package an engraved stamp indicative of such intention, to be provided and furnished to the several collectors, as in the case of other stamps, and to be charged to them and accounted for in the same manner; and for the expense attending the providing and affixing such stamps, twenty-five cents for each package so stamped shall be paid to the collector on making the entry for such transportation; but the provisions of this section shall not limit the time for tobacco or snuff to remain in bond.

SEC. 75. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where tobacco or snuff of any description is manufactured, in whole or in part, upon commission or shares, or where the material from which any such articles are made, or are to be made, is furnished by one person and made or manufactured by another, or where the material is furnished or sold by one person with an understanding or agreement with another that the manufactured article is to be received in payment therefor or for any part thereof, the stamps required by law shall be fixed by the actual maker or manufacturer before the article passes from the place of making or manufacturing. And in case of fraud on the part of either of said persons in respect to said manufacture, or of any collusion on their part with intent to defraud the revenue, such material and manufactured articles shall be forfeited to the United States; and each party to such fraud or collusion shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 76. And be it further enacted, That every dealer in leaf tobacco shall enter daily in a book kept for that purpose, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, the number of hogheads, cases, and pounds of leaf tobacco purchased by him, and of whom purchased, and the number of hogheads, cases, or pounds sold by him, with the name and residence, in each instance, of the person to whom sold, and if shipped, to whom shipped, and to what district. Such book shall be kept at his place of business, and shall be open at all hours to the inspection of any assessor, collector, or other revenue officer; and any dealer in leaf tobacco who shall neglect or refuse to keep such book shall be liable to a penalty of not less than five hundred dollars, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 77. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, and until the first day of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, all manufactured tobacco and snuff (not including cigars) imported from foreign countries shall be placed by the owner, importer, or consignee thereof in a bonded warehouse of the United States at the place of importation, in the same manner and under rules as provided for warehousing goods imported into the United States, and shall not be withdrawn from such warehouse, nor be entered for consumption or transportation in the United States prior to the said first day of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. All manufactured tobacco and snuff (not including cigars) imported from foreign countries, after the passage of this act, shall, in addition to the import duties imposed on the same, pay the tax prescribed in this act for like kinds of tobacco and snuff manufactured in the United States, and have the same stamps respectively affixed. Such stamps shall be affixed and canceled on all such articles so imported by the owner or importer thereof, while such articles are in the proper custom-house officers, and such articles shall not pass out of the custody of such officers until the stamps have been affixed and canceled. Such tobacco and snuff shall be put up in packages, as prescribed in this act for like articles manufactured in the United States before such stamps are affixed; and the owner or importer of such tobacco and snuff shall be liable to all the penal provisions of this act, prescribed for manufacturers of tobacco and snuff manufactured in the United States. Where it shall be necessary to take any such articles, so imported, to any place for the purpose of repacking, affixing, and canceling such stamps, other than the public stores of the United States, the collector of customs of the port where such articles shall be entered shall designate a bonded warehouse to which such articles shall be taken, under the control of such customs officer as such collector may direct. And any officer of customs who shall permit any such articles to pass out of his custody or control without compliance by the owner or importer thereof with the provisions of this section relating thereto, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 78. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of every dealer in manufactured tobacco, having on hand more than twenty pounds, and every dealer in snuff having on hand more than ten pounds, to immediately make a true and correct inventory of the amount of such tobacco and snuff, respectively, under oath or affirmation, and to deposit such inventory with the assistant assessor of the proper division, who shall immediately return the same to the assessor of the district, who shall immediately thereafter make an abstract of the several inventories filed in his office, and transmit such abstract to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and a like inventory and return shall be made on the first day of every month thereafter, and a like abstract of inventories shall be transmitted while any such dealer has tobacco or snuff remaining on hand manufactured in the United States, or imported prior to the passage of this act, and not stamped. After the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, all smoking, fine-cut chewing tobacco, or snuff, and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, all other manufactured tobacco of every description, shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after the passage of this act, and shall not be sold or offered for sale unless put up in packages and stamped as prescribed by this act, except at retail by retail dealers from wooden packages stamped as provided for in this act; and any person who shall sell, or offer for sale, after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, any smoking, fine-cut chewing tobacco, or snuff, and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, any other manufactured tobacco not so put up in packages and stamped, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 79. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall, after the passage of this act, sell, or offer for sale, any manufactured tobacco or snuff, representing the same to have been manufactured and the tax paid thereon prior to the passage of this act, when the same was not so manufactured, and the tax not so paid, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars for each offense, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 80. And be it further enacted, That all manufactured tobacco and snuff, manufactured prior to the passage of this act, and held in bond at the time of its passage, may be sold for consumption in the original packages, with the proper stamps for the amount of the tax thereon affixed and canceled as required by law; and any person who shall, after the passage of this act, offer for sale any tobacco or snuff, in packages of a different size from those limited and prescribed by this act, representing the same to have been held in bond at the time of the passage of this act, when the same was not so held in bond, shall, on conviction, be fined fifty dollars for each package in respect to which such offense shall be committed: Provided, That after the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, no such tobacco or snuff shall be sold or removed for sale or consumption from any bonded warehouse unless put up in packages and stamped as provided by this act.

SEC. 81. And be it further enacted, That upon cigars which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected the following taxes, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof:

On cigars of all descriptions, made of tobacco or any substitute thereof, five dollars per thousand; on cigarettes weighing not exceeding three pounds per thousand, one dollar and fifty cents per thousand; when weighing exceeding three pounds per thousand, five dollars per thousand. And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe such regulations for the inspection of cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes, and the collection of the tax thereon, as shall, in his judgment, be most effective for the prevention of frauds in the payment of such tax.

SEC. 82. And be it further enacted, That every person before commencing, or, if already commenced, before continuing, the manufacture of cigars, shall furnish, without previous demand therefor, to the assistant assessor of the division a statement in duplicate, subscribed under oath or affirmation, accurately setting forth the place, and, if in a city, the street and number of the street where the manufacture is to be carried on; and if the same shall be manufactured for, or to be sold and delivered to, any other person, the name and residence and business or occupation of the person for whom the cigars are to be manufactured or to whom to be delivered; and shall give a bond in conformity with the provisions of this act, in such penal sum as the assessor of the district may require, not less than five hundred dollars, with an addition of one hundred dollars for each person proposed to be employed by him in making cigars, conditioned that he will not employ any person to manufacture cigars who has not been duly registered as a cigar-maker; that he will not engage in any attempt, by himself or by collusion with others, to defraud the Government of any tax on his manufactures; that he will render truly and correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed; that whenever he shall add to the number of cigar-makers employed by him, he will immediately give notice thereof to the collector of the district; that he will stamp, in accordance with law, all cigars manufactured by him before he offers the same or any part thereof for sale, and before he removes any part thereof from the place of manufacture; that he will not knowingly sell, purchase, expose, or receive for sale any cigars which have not been stamped as required by law; and that he will comply with all the requirements of law relating to the manufacture of cigars. The sum of said bond may be increased from time to time, and additional sureties required at the discretion of the assessor, or under the instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Every cigar manufacturer shall obtain from the collector of the district, who is hereby required to issue the same, a certificate setting forth the number of cigar-makers for which the bond has been given, which certificate shall be posted in a conspicuous place within the manufactory; and any cigar manufacturer who shall neglect or refuse to obtain such certificate, or to keep the same posted as hereinbefore provided, shall, on conviction, be fined one hundred dollars. Any person manufacturing cigars of any description without first giving bond as herein required, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than five years. Cigarettes and cheroots shall be held to be cigars under the meaning of this act.

SEC. 83. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act every cigar manufacturer shall place and keep on the side or end of the building within which his business is carried on, so that it can be distinctly seen, a sign, with letters thereon not less than three inches in length, painted in oil colors or gilded, giving his full name and business. Any person neglecting to comply with the requirements of this section shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars.

SEC. 84. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every assistant assessor to keep a record, in a book to be provided for the purpose, to be open to the inspection of any person, of the name and residence of every person engaged in the manufacture of cigars in his division, the place where such manufacture is carried on, and the number of the manufactory, together with the names and residences of every cigar-maker employed in his division; and the assistant assessor shall enter in said record, under the name of each manufacturer, an abstract of his inventories and monthly returns; and each assessor shall keep a similar record for the district, and shall cause the several manufactories of cigars in the district to be numbered consecutively, which number shall not thereafter be changed.

SEC. 85. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act all cigars shall be packed in boxes, not before used for that purpose, containing, respectively, twenty-five, fifty, one hundred, two hundred and fifty, or five hundred cigars each; and any person who shall sell or offer for sale, or deliver or offer to deliver, any cigars in any other form than in new boxes as above described, or who shall pack in any box any cigars in excess of the number provided by law to be put in each box, respectively, or who shall falsely brand any box, or who shall affix a stamp on any box denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall upon conviction, for any of the above described offenses, be fined for each such offense not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the sale of cigars at retail by retail dealers who have paid the special tax as such from boxes packed, stamped, and branded in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 86. And be it further enacted, That every person now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of cigars shall make and deliver to the assistant assessor of the division a true inventory, in form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the quantity of leaf tobacco, cigars, stems, scraps, clippings, and waste, and the number of cigar-boxes and the capacity of each box held or owned by him on the first day of January of each year, or at the time of commencing and at the time of concluding business, if before or after the first of January, setting forth what portion of said goods, and what kinds, were manufactured or produced by him, and what were purchased from others, which inventory shall be verified by his oath or affirmation indorsed on said inventory; and the assistant assessor shall make personal examination of the stock sufficient to satisfy himself as to the correctness of the inventory, and shall verify the fact of such examination by oath or affirmation taken before the assessor, also to be indorsed on the inventory; and every such person shall enter daily in a book, the form of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid purchased by him, the quantity of leaf tobacco, cigars, stems, or cigar-boxes, of whatever description, manufactured, sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture; and shall, on or before the tenth day of each and every month, furnish to the assistant assessor of the division a true and accurate abstract from such book of all such purchases, sales, and removals made during the month next preceding, which abstract shall be verified by his oath or affirmation; and in case of refusal or willful neglect to deliver the inventory, or keep the account, or furnish the abstract aforesaid, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. It shall be the duty of any dealer in leaf tobacco or material used in manufacturing cigars, on demand of any officer of internal revenue authorized by law, to render to such officer a true and correct statement, verified by oath or affirmation, of the quantity and amount of such leaf tobacco or materials sold or delivered to any person or persons named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or if there is cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the assessor shall make an examination of persons, books, and papers, in the same manner as provided in this act in relation to frauds and evasions.

SEC. 87. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared, for payment of the tax upon cigars, suitable stamps denoting the tax thereon; and all cigars shall be packed in quantities of twenty-five, fifty, one hundred, two hundred and fifty, and five hundred; and all such stamps shall be furnished to collectors requiring the same, who shall, if there be any cigar manufacturers within their respective districts, keep on hand at all times a supply equal in amount to two months' sales thereof, and shall sell the same only to the cigar manufacturers who have given bonds and paid the special tax, as required by law, in their districts respectively, and to importers of cigars who are required to affix the same to imported cigars in the custody of customs officers and to persons required by law to affix the same to cigars on hand on the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-nine; and every collector shall keep an account of the number, amount, and denominate values of the stamps sold by him to each cigar manufacturer, and to other persons above described: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the duty on all cigars imported into the United States from foreign countries shall be two dollars and fifty cents [per] pound, and twenty-five per centum ad valorem.

SEC. 88. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of cigars shall securely affix, by pasting on each box containing cigars manufactured by or for him, a label on which shall be printed, together with the manufacturer's name, the number of his manufactory, and the district and State in which it is situated, these words:

"NOTICE.—The manufacturer of the cigars herein contained has complied with all the requirements of law. Every person is cautioned, under the penalties of law, not to use this box for cigars again."

Any manufacturer of cigars who shall neglect to affix such label to any box containing cigars made by or for him, or sold or offered for sale by or for him, or any person who shall remove any such label, so affixed, from any such box, shall, upon conviction thereof, be finer fifty dollars for each box in respect to which such offense shall be committed.

SEC. 89. And be it further enacted, That all cigars which shall be removed from any manufactory or place where cigars are made without the same being packed in boxes as required by this act, or without the proper stamp thereon denoting the tax, or without burning into each box with a branding-iron the number of the cigars contained therein, and the name of the manufacturer, and the number of the district and the State, or without the stamp denoting the tax thereon being properly affixed and canceled, or which shall be sold or offered for sale not properly boxed and stamped, shall be forfeited to the United States. And any person who shall commit any of the above-described offenses shall, on conviction, be fined for each such offense not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years. And any person who shall pack cigars in any box bearing a false or fraudulent or counterfeit stamp, or who shall remove or cause to be removed any stamp denoting the tax on cigars from any box, with intent to use the same, or who shall use or permit any other person to use any stamp so removed, or who shall receive, buy, sell, give away, or have in his possession any stamp so removed, or who shall make any other fraudulent use of any stamp or stamped box, intended for cigars, or who shall remove from the place of manufacture any cigars not properly boxed and stamped as required by law, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 90. And be it further enacted, That the absence of the proper revenue stamp on any box of cigars sold, or offered for sale, or kept for sale, shall be notice to all persons that the tax has not been paid thereon, and shall be prima facie evidence of the non-payment thereof; and such cigars shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 91. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where cigars of any description are manufactured, in whole or in part, upon commission or shares, or where the material is furnished by one party and manufactured by another, or where the material is furnished or sold by one party with an understanding or agreement with another that the cigars are to be received in payment therefor, or for any part thereof, the stamps required by law shall be affixed by the actual maker before the cigars are removed from the place of manufacturing. And in case of fraud on the part of either of said parties in respect to said manufacture, or of any collusion on their part with intent to defraud the revenue, such material and cigars shall be forfeited to the United States, and every person engaged in such fraud or collusion shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 92. And be it further enacted, That any manufacturer of cigars who shall remove or sell any cigars without payment of the special tax as a cigar manufacturer, or without having given bond as such, or without the proper stamps denoting the tax thereon, or who shall make false or fraudulent entries of manufactures or sale of any cigars, or who shall make false or fraudulent entries of the purchase or sales of leaf tobacco, tobacco stems, or other material used in the manufacture of cigars, or who shall affix any false, forged, spurious, fraudulent, or counterfeit stamp, or imitation of any stamp, required by law to any box containing any cigars shall, in addition to the penalties elsewhere provided in this act for such offenses, forfeit to the United States all raw material and manufactured or partly manufactured tobacco and cigars, and all machinery, tools, implements, apparatus, fixtures, boxes, barrels, and all other materials, which shall be found in the possession of such person, or in his manufactory, and used in his business as such manufacturer, together with his estate or interest in the building or factory and the lot or tract of ground on which such building or factory is located, and all appurtenances thereunto pertaining.

SEC. 93. And be it further enacted, That all cigars imported from foreign countries after the passage of this act, shall, in addition to the import duties imposed on the same, pay the tax prescribed in this act for cigars manufactured in the United States, and have the same stamps affixed. Such stamps shall be affixed and canceled by the owner or importer of cigars while they are in the custody of the proper custom-house officers; and such cigars shall not pass out of the custody of such officers until the stamps have been so affixed and canceled, but shall be put up in boxes containing quantities as prescribed in this act for cigars manufactured in the United States before such stamps are affixed. And the owner or importer of such cigars shall be liable to all the penal provisions of this act, prescribed for manufacturers of cigars manufactured in the United States. Where it shall be necessary to take any of such cigars, so imported, to any place for the purpose of affixing and canceling such stamps, other than the public stores of the United States, the collector of customs of the port where such cigars shall be entered shall designate a bonded warehouse to which they shall be taken, under the control of such customs officer as such collector may direct. And any officer of customs who shall permit any such cigars to pass out of his custody or control without compliance by the owner or importer thereof with the provisions of this section relating thereto shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 94. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of every dealer in cigars, either of foreign or domestic manufacture, having on hand more than five thousand thereof, imported or manufactured, or purporting or claimed to have been imported or manufactured, prior to the passage of this act, to immediately make a true and correct inventory of the quantity of such cigars in his possession, under oath or affirmation, and to deposit such inventory with the assistant assessor of the proper division, who shall immediately return the same to the assessor of the district, who shall immediately thereafter make an abstract of the several such inventories filed in his office, and transmit the same to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and a like inventory and return shall be made on the first day of every month thereafter, and a like abstract of inventories shall be transmitted, while any such dealer has any such cigars remaining on hand, until the first day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. After the first day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, all cigars of every description shall be taken to have been either manufactured or imported after the passage of this act, and shall be stamped accordingly; and any person who shall sell, or offer for sale, after the first day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, any imported cigars, or cigars purporting or claimed to have been imported, not so put up in packages and stamped as provided by this act, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

SEC. 95. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall, after the passage of this act, sell or offer for sale any cigars, representing the same to have been manufactured and the tax paid thereon prior to the passage of this act, when the same were not so manufactured and the tax not so paid, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars for each offense, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 96. And be it further enacted, That if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, shall knowingly and willfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars; and if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest as owner, and if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 97. And be it further enacted, That any internal revenue officer who shall be or become interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or in the production, rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits, shall be dismissed from office; and any such officer who shall become so interested in any such manufacture or production, rectification, or redistillation, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars.

SEC. 98. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of any extortion or willful oppression, under color of law; or shall knowingly demand other or greater sums than shall be authorized by law; or shall receive any fee, compensation, or reward for the performance of any duty, except as by law prescribed; or shall willfully neglect to perform any of the duties enjoined on him by law; or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States; or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States; or shall do, or omit to do, any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States; or shall negligently or designedly permit any violation of the law by any other person; or shall make or sign any false entry in any book, or make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make any entry, certificate, or return; or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report, in writing, such knowledge or information to his next superior officer, and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; or shall demand, or accept, or attempt to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment or gift or otherwise, any sum of money or other thing of value for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of any charge or complaint for any violation or alleged violation of law, except as expressly authorized by law so to do, he shall be dismissed from office, and shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

Laws of the United States.

And one half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court; and the said court shall also render judgment against the said officer or agent for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution.

SEC. 99. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall simulate or falsely or fraudulently execute or sign any bond, permit, entry, or other document required by the provisions of this act, or by any regulation made in pursuance thereof, or who shall procure the same to be falsely or fraudulently executed; or who shall advise, aid in, or connive at the execution thereof, shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for a term not less than one year nor more than five years; and the property to which such false or fraudulent instrument relates shall be forfeited.

SEC. 100. And be it further enacted, That every collector having charge of any warehouse in which distilled spirits, tobacco, or other articles are stored in bond, shall render a monthly account of all such articles to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which account shall be examined and adjusted, monthly, by him, so as to exhibit a true statement of the liability and responsibility of every such collector on such account. In adjusting such account the collector shall be charged with all the articles which may have been deposited or received under the provisions of law in any warehouse in his district and under his control, and shall be credited with all such articles shown to have been removed therefrom according to law, including transfers to other collectors and to his successor in office, and also whatever allowances may have been made in accordance with law to any owner of such goods or articles for leakage or other losses.

SEC. 101. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue are authorized and empowered to alter, renew, or change the form, style, and device of any stamp, mark, or label used under any provision of the laws relating to distilled spirits, tobacco, snuff, and cigars, when in their judgment necessary for the collection of revenue tax, or the prevention or detection of frauds thereon; and to make and publish such regulations for the use of such mark, stamp, or label as they may find requisite. But in no case shall such renewal or change extend to an abandonment of the general character of the stamps provided for in this act, nor to the dispensing with any provisions requiring that such stamps shall be kept in book form and have thereon the signatures of revenue officers.

SEC. 102. And be it further enacted, That in all cases arising under the internal revenue laws where, instead of commencing or proceeding with a suit in court, it may appear to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to be for the interest of the United States to compromise the same, he is empowered and authorized to make such compromise with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury; and in every case where a compromise is made there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the solicitor of internal revenue, or officer acting as such, with his reasons therefor, together with a statement of the amount of tax assessed, the amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, and the amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise; but no such compromise shall be made of any case after a suit or proceeding in court has been commenced without the recommendation also of the Attorney General: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the court at any stage of such suit or criminal proceedings to continue the same for good cause shown on motion of the district attorney.

SEC. 103. And be it further enacted, That when any tax is imposed, and the mode or time of assessment or collection is not provided for, the same shall be established by regulation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the Commissioner is authorized to make all such regulations, not otherwise provided for, as may become necessary by reason of any change of law in relation to internal revenue made by this act.

SEC. 104. And be it further enacted, That where not otherwise distinctly expressed or manifestly incompatible with the intent thereof, the word "person," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean and include a firm, partnership, association, company, or corporation, as well as a natural person; and words of the masculine gender, as applied to persons, to mean and include the feminine gender; and the singular number to mean and include the plural number; and the word "State" to mean and include a Territory and District of Columbia; and the word "county" to mean and include parish, district, or other equivalent territorial subdivision of a State.

SEC. 105. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That all the provisions of said acts shall be in force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of former acts, the right to which has already accrued or which may hereafter accrue under said acts, and for maintaining, continuing, and enforcing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof. And this act shall not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved; and all suits and prosecutions for acts already done in violation of any former act or acts of Congress, relating to the subjects embraced in this act, may be commenced or proceeded with in like manner as if this act had not been passed: And provided further, That no office created by the said acts and continued by this act shall be vacated by reason of any provisions herein contained, but the officers heretofore appointed shall continue to hold the said offices without reappointment until their successors, or other officers to perform their duties, respectively, shall be appointed as provided in this act: And provided further, That whenever the duty imposed by any existing law shall cease in consequence of any limitation therein contained before the respective provisions of this act shall take effect, the same duty or tax shall be, and is hereby, continued until such provisions of this act shall take effect; and where any act is hereby repealed, no duty or tax imposed thereby shall be held to cease in consequence of such repeal, until the respective correspective corresponding provisions of this act shall take effect.

SEC. 106. And be it further enacted, That in any case where there has been a refusal or neglect to pay any tax imposed by the internal revenue laws, and where it is lawful and has become necessary to seize and sell real estate to satisfy the tax, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, if he deems it expedient, direct that a bill in chancery be filed, in a district or circuit court of the United States, to enforce the lien of the United States for tax upon any real estate, or to subject any real estate owned by the delinquent, or in which he has any right, title, or interest, to the payment of such tax. And all persons having liens upon the real estate sought to be subjected to the payment of any tax as aforesaid, or claiming any ownership or interest therein, shall be made parties to such proceedings, and shall be brought into court as provided in other suits in chancery in said courts. And the said courts shall have, and are hereby given, jurisdiction in all such cases, and shall at the term next after such time as the parties shall be duly notified of the proceedings, unless otherwise ordered by the court, proceed to adjudicate all matters involved therein, and to pass upon and finally determine the merits of all claims to and liens upon the real estate in question, and shall, in all cases where a claim or interest of the United States therein shall be established, decree a sale, by the proper officer of the court, of such real estate, and a distribution of the proceeds of such sale according to the findings of the court in respect to the interests of the parties and of the United States.

SEC. 107. And be it further enacted, That the internal revenue laws imposing taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, and cigars, shall be held and construed to extend to such articles produced anywhere within the exterior boundaries of the United States, whether the same shall be within a collection district or not.

SEC. 108. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of this act which require the use of stamps shall take effect at the end of sixty days from the passage of this act: Provided, That if at any time prior to the expiration of the said sixty days it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that a longer delay is necessary for the preparation and due delivery of any of such stamps, he shall be authorized to fix a day not later than the first day of December next for putting said provisions, relative to the use of either of such stamps, into operation, and shall give public notice of the day so fixed and determined upon, which day shall then be held and taken to be the time when that portion of this act which requires the use of stamps shall have effect.

SEC. 109. And be it further enacted, That so much of all acts and parts of acts as impose any internal revenue tax on illuminating or other mineral oil, and on the product of the distillation, redistillation, or refining of crude petroleum, or of crude oil produced by a single distillation of coal, shale, peat, asphaltum, or other bituminous substances, together with all provisions relating to returns, assessment, warehousing, and bonding, and all other provisions for determining the quantity of mineral oil distilled, for the purposes of securing the payment of the tax thereon, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and no tax imposed by existing laws on such oils or products in the hands of the producer or manufacturer or his agent or agents at the passage of this act, and unsold, shall be collected; but distillers and refiners of mineral oils shall be considered as manufacturers and subject to the tax on sales provided for in the fourth section of the act "to exempt certain manufacturers from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March thirty-first, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

CHAP. CCXXVII.—An Act to authorize the temporary Supplying of Vacancies in the Executive Departments.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the head of any executive Department of the Government, the first or sole assistant thereof shall, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, perform the duties of such head until a successor be appointed, or such absence or sickness shall cease.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the chief of any bureau, or of any officer thereof, except Commissioner of Patents, whose appointment is not in the head of any executive Department, the deputy of such chief or of such officer, or if there be no deputy, then the chief clerk of such bureau, shall, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, perform the duties of such chief or of such officer until a successor be appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease. And no appointment, designation, or assignment otherwise than as is herein provided, in the cases mentioned in the first, second, and third sections of this act, shall be made except to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any of the cases hereinbefore mentioned it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in his discretion, to authorize and direct the head of any other executive Department or other officer in either of those Departments whose appointment is, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, vested in the President, to perform the duties of the office vacant as aforesaid until a successor be appointed, or the sickness or absence of the incumbent shall cease: Provided, That nothing in this act shall authorize the supplying as aforesaid a vacancy for a longer period than ten days when such vacancy shall be occasioned by death or resignation; and the officer so performing the duties of the office temporarily vacant shall not be entitled to extra compensation therefor: And provided also, That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Commissioner of Patents, the duties of said Commissioner, until a successor be appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, shall devolve upon the examiner-in-chief in said office oldest in length of commission.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts heretofore passed on the subject of temporarily supplying vacancies in the Executive Departments, or which empower the President to authorize any person or persons to perform the duties of the head of any executive Department, or of any officer in either of the Departments, in case of a vacancy therein or inability of such head of a Department or officer to discharge the duties of his office, and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

CHAP. CCXXVIII.—An Act making a Grant of Land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the Improvement of the Navigation of the Mississippi River.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of aiding said State in constructing and completing a lock and dam at Meeker's island, (so called,) in the Mississippi river, in said State, and thereby facilitating the navigation of the Mississippi river between the falls of St. Anthony and the mouth of the Minnesota river, two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to be selected in alternate odd-numbered sections by an agent to be appointed by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That said lands shall be selected from the public lands lying within the limits of the said State of Minnesota, and that not more than one section thereof shall be selected in any one township: Provided further, That said selections shall not be made from any lands containing mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, nor from any lands to which rights of preemption or homestead have attached.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said lands so granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of said State for the purposes mentioned in the first section of this act, and no other; and the said lock and dam shall be and remain forever a public highway, free from any toll or charge of any kind whatever; and the said Legislature shall have power to pass all needful rules and regulations that may be necessary to fully carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the work shall be done under the direction of the engineer department of the United States, according to the plan and estimate submitted by Major General Warren, and that if said lock and dam are not constructed within two years from and after the date of the acceptance and disposition of this grant by the Legislature of the said State, the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That at any time after the selection of the said lands, and subsequent to the completion of said lock and dam, the lands hereby granted shall be open for settlement by actual settlers upon paying to the State of Minnesota a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for the same, which shall be paid by the State to the company who may construct said lock and dam.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if at any time prior to the completion of the said lock and dam the Government of the United States shall make an appropriation in money sufficient to construct said lock and dam, then the grant of lands herein made shall revert to the United States: Provided, That this act shall have no effect on lands already granted for railroad purposes.

the recommendation of the Secretary of War, in book of estimates of appropriations, pages two hundred and forty-four and two hundred and forty-five, two hundred and ninety-six thousand nine hundred and forty-three dollars and eighty-eight cents: Provided, That section fifteen of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Washington and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," approved May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and twenty; and section three of an act approved May fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and twenty," are hereby repealed; and no improvements of the streets, alleys, avenues, or other property of the United States in the city of Washington, authorized by said act, which is to be paid for by the United States, shall hereafter be made until an appropriation shall have been made therefor, and such appropriation, when made, shall be expended under the direction of the chief engineer of the Army.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement whatever, which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose. And if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of two thousand dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all laws making an appropriation for the payment of the salaries of the solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of the Assistant Attorney General, for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the salaries of two Assistant Attorneys General, one clerk, and two clerks of class four, for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, twelve thousand four hundred dollars.

CHAP. CCXXXIV.—An Act for the Relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to adopt and ratify the compromise and agreements entered into and executed on the twentieth and twenty-first of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, between the legally authorized representatives of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, and the legally authorized representative of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, claimants under the forty-ninth article of the treaty of April twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, as a full and final settlement of all claims under the aforesaid article of said treaty. And the amount as stipulated in the aforesaid agreements to be paid to the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw claimants, to wit: to the Choctaw claimants the sum of one hundred and nine thousand seven hundred and forty-two dollars and eight cents, and to the Chickasaw claimants the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior to said claimants, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States belonging to, or held in trust for, said nations of Indians; but in case there is not a sufficient amount of money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to, or held in trust for, said nation of Indians, to discharge their respective obligations to the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, (claimants,) or in case the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians shall request it, then the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to sell such bonds or other securities held in trust by the United States for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians as may be necessary to discharge their respective obligations to the aforesaid loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw claimants, as stipulated in the aforesaid compromise and agreements: Provided, That no bonds or securities shall be sold for less than par: And provided further, That no payments shall be made nor bonds delivered under the provisions of this act except in every case to the person actually entitled in his own right to receive the same; nor shall any contract or power of attorney relating to the same be regarded or held as of any validity unless signed and executed after the passage of this act: And provided also, That the bonds of the State of Indiana held by the United States shall not be sold under the provisions of this act.

CHAP. CCXXXV.—An Act to provide a Temporary Government for the Territory of Wyoming.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that part of the United States described as follows: commencing at the intersection of the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, and running thence west to the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude, thence south to the forty-first degree of north latitude, thence east to the twenty-seventh meridian of west longitude, and thence north to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby, organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Wyoming: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians: Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory into two or more Territories, in such manner and at such time as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion thereof to any other Territory or State.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the executive power and authority in and over said Territory of Wyoming shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Governor shall reside within said Territory, shall be commander-in-chief of the militia thereof, shall perform the duties and receive the emoluments of superintendent of Indian affairs, and shall approve all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly before they shall take effect, unless the same shall pass by a two-thirds vote as provided in section six of this act; he may grant pardons for offenses against the laws of said Territory, and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States, until the decision of the President can be made known thereon; he shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to office under the laws of said Territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a secretary of said Territory, who shall reside therein and hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, with the consent of the Senate; he shall record and preserve all the laws and the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly hereinafter constituted, and all acts and proceedings of the Governor in his executive department; he shall transmit one copy of the laws and one copy of the executive proceedings on or before the first day of December in each year to the President of the United States, and, at the same time, two copies of the laws to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate for the use of Congress; and in case of the death, removal, resignation, or other necessary absence of the Governor from the Territory, the secretary shall have, and he is hereby authorized and required to execute and perform, all the powers and duties of the Governor during such vacancy or absence, or until another Governor shall be appointed to fill such vacancy.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in the Governor and Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a council and house of representatives. The council shall consist of nine members, which may be increased to thirteen, having the qualifications of voters as hereinafter prescribed, whose term of service shall continue two years. The House of Representatives shall consist of thirteen members, which may be increased to twenty-seven, possessing the same qualifications as prescribed for members of the council, and whose term of service shall continue one year. An apportionment shall be made by the Governor as nearly equal as practicable among the several counties or districts for the election of the council and house of representatives, giving to each section of the Territory representation in the ratio of their population, (excepting Indians not taxed,) as nearly as may be; and the members of the council and house of representatives shall reside in and be inhabitants of the districts for which they may be elected, respectively. Previous to the first election the Governor shall cause a census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the several counties or districts of the Territory to be taken, and the first election shall be held at such times and places, and be conducted in such manner as the Governor shall appoint and direct; and he shall at the same time declare the number of the members of the council and house of representatives to which each of the counties or districts shall be entitled under this act. The number of persons authorized to be elected, having the highest number of votes in each of said council districts for members of the council, shall be declared by the Governor duly elected to the council; and the person or persons authorized to be elected having the greatest number of votes for the house of representatives equal to the number to which each county or district shall be entitled shall be declared by the Governor to be elected members of the house of representatives: Provided, That in case of a tie between two or more persons voted for, the Governor shall order a new election, to supply the vacancy made by such tie vote. And the persons thus elected to the Legislative Assembly shall meet at such place and on such day as the Governor shall appoint; but thereafter the time, place, and manner of holding and conducting elections by the people, and the apportioning the representation in the several counties or districts to the council and house of representatives, according to the population, shall be prescribed by law, as well as the day of the commencement of the regular sessions of the Legislative Assembly: Provided, That no one session shall exceed the term of forty days, except the first, which may be extended to sixty days, but no longer.

Laws of the United States.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, and [including] persons who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall have been a resident of the said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first and all subsequent elections in the Territory, and shall be eligible to hold any office in said Territory. And the Legislative Assembly shall not at any time abridge the right of suffrage, or to hold office, on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of any resident of the Territory: Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, and those who shall have declared on oath before a competent court of record their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution and Government of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, [That] the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act; but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States, nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents, nor shall any law be passed impairing the rights of private property, nor shall any unequal discrimination be made in taxing different kinds of property, but all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value. Every bill which shall have passed the council and the house of representatives of said Territory shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two thirds of that house it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, to be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within five days (Sunday excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Assembly, by adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all township, district, and county officers, not herein otherwise provided for, shall be appointed or elected, as the case may be, in such manner as shall be provided by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory. The Governor shall nominate and by and with the consent of the council appoint all officers not herein otherwise provided for, and in the first instance the Governor alone may appoint all such officers, who shall hold their offices until the end of the first session of the Legislative Assembly; and he shall lay off the necessary districts for members of the council and house of representatives, and all other officers.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no member of the Legislative Assembly shall hold or be appointed to any office which shall have been created, or the salary or emoluments of which shall have been increased while he was a member, during the term for which he was elected, and for one year after the expiration of such term; and no person holding a commission or appointment under the United States, except postmasters, shall be a member of the Legislative Assembly, or shall hold any office under the government of said Territory.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the judicial power of said Territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. The supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, and who shall hold a term at the seat of government of said Territory annually; and they shall hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed by the President with the consent of the Senate of the United States. The said Territory shall be divided into three judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each of said districts by one of the justices of the supreme court; at such time and place as may be prescribed by law; and said judges shall after their appointments, respectively, reside in the districts which shall be assigned them. The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of the probate courts, and of the justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law: Provided, That justices of the peace shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy when the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute, or where the debt or sum claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars; and the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction and authority for redress of all wrongs committed against the Constitution or laws of the United States or of the Territory affecting persons or property. Each district court, or the judge thereof, shall appoint its clerk, who shall also be the register in chancery, and shall keep his office where the court may be held. Writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals shall be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of said district courts to the supreme court under such regulations as may be prescribed by law, but in no case removed to the supreme court shall trial by jury be allowed in said court. The supreme court, or the justices thereof, shall appoint its own clerks, and every clerk shall hold his office at the pleasure of the court for which he shall have been appointed. Writs of error and appeal from the final decision of said supreme court shall be allowed and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness, shall exceed one thousand dollars; and each of the said district courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States; and the said supreme and district courts of said Territory, and the respective judges thereof, shall and may grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which the same are grantable by the judges of the United States in the District of Columbia; and the first six days of every term of said courts, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be appropriated to the trial of causes arising under the said Constitution and laws; and writs of error and appeals in all such cases shall be made to the supreme court of said Territory, the same as in other cases. The said clerk shall receive in all such cases the same fees which the clerks of the district courts of Dakota Territory now receive for similar services.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed an attorney for said Territory, who shall continue in office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President with the consent of the Senate, and who shall receive the same fees and salary as is now received by the attorney of the United States for the Territory of Dacotah, [Dakota.] There shall also be a marshal for the Territory appointed, who shall hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President with the consent of the Senate, and who shall execute all processes issuing from the said courts when exercising their jurisdiction as circuit and district courts of the United States; he shall perform the duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties, and be entitled to the same fees as the marshal of the district court of the United States for the present Territory of Dakota, and shall, in addition, be paid two hundred dollars annually as a compensation for extra services.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Governor, secretary, chief justice, and associate justices, attorney, and marshal, shall be nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed by the President of the United States. The Governor and secretary to be appointed as aforesaid shall, before they act as such, respectively, take an oath or affirmation before the district judge, or some justice of the peace in the limits of said Territory duly authorized to administer oaths and affirmations by the laws now in force therein; or before the Chief Justice, or some associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to discharge the duties of their respective offices, which said oaths when so taken shall be certified by the person by whom the same shall have been taken; and such certificates shall be received and recorded by the secretary among the executive proceedings, and the chief justice, and associate justices, and all other civil officers in said Territory, before they act as such, shall take a like oath or affirmation before the said Governor or secretary, or some judge or justice of the peace of the Territory, who may be duly commissioned and qualified, which said oath or affirmation shall be certified and transmitted by the person taking the same to the secretary, to be recorded by him as aforesaid, and afterwards the like oath or affirmation shall be taken, certified, and recorded in such manner and form as may be prescribed by law. The Governor shall receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars as Governor, and one thousand dollars as superintendent of Indian affairs; the chief justice and the associate justices shall each receive an annual salary of twenty-five hundred dollars, and the secretary shall receive an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars. The said salaries shall be payable quarter yearly at the Treasury of the United States. The members of the Legislative Assembly shall be entitled to receive four dollars each per day during their attendance at the session thereof, and three dollars for every twenty miles' travel in going to and returning from the said sessions, estimating the distance by the nearest traveled route. There shall be appropriated annually the sum of one thousand dollars, to be expended by the Governor, to defray the contingent expenses of the Territory. There shall also be appropriated annually a sufficient sum, to be expended by the secretary, and upon an estimate to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses; and the secretary of the Territory shall annually account to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the manner in which the aforesaid sum shall have been expended.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming shall hold its first session at such time and place in said Territory as the Governor thereof shall appoint and direct; and at said first session, or as soon thereafter as they shall deem expedient, the Governor and Legislative Assembly shall proceed to locate and establish the seat of government for said Territory at such place as they may deem eligible; which place, however, shall thereafter be subject to be changed by the said Governor and Legislative Assembly.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress of the United States, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as are exercised and enjoyed by the Delegates from the several other Territories of the United States in the said House of Representatives. The first election shall be held at such time and places, and be conducted in such manner, as the Governor shall appoint and direct; and at all subsequent elections the time, place, and manner of holding elections shall be prescribed by law. The person having the greatest number of votes of the qualified electors as hereinbefore provided, shall be declared by the Governor elected, and a certificate thereof shall be accordingly given.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved for the purpose of being applied to public schools in the State or States hereafter to be erected out of the same.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That temporarily and until otherwise provided by law the Governor of said Territory may define the judicial districts of said Territory, and assign the judges who may be appointed for the said Territory to the several districts, and also appoint the times and places for holding courts in the several counties or subdivisions in each of said judicial districts by proclamation to be issued by him; but the Legislative Assembly, at their first or any subsequent session, may organize, alter, or modify such judicial districts and assign the judges and alter the times and places of holding the courts as to them shall seem proper and convenient.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Wyoming as elsewhere within the United States.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the time when the executive and judicial officers herein provided for shall have been duly appointed and qualified: Provided, That all general territorial laws of the Territory of Dakota in force in any portion of said Territory of Wyoming at the time this act shall take effect shall be and continue in force throughout the said Territory until repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory, except such laws as relate to the possession or occupation of mines or mining claims.

CHAP. CCXXXVI.—An Act in addition to an Act passed March twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and four, entitled "An Act in addition to an Act entitled 'An Act for the Punishment of certain Crimes against the United States.'"

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for the capital offenses set forth in the act to which this act is in addition, unless the indictment for the same is found by a grand jury within five years after such capital offense is committed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and its provisions shall be applicable equally to offenses committed within three years before and offenses committed after its passage.

CHAP. CCXXXVII.—An Act to provide for a further issue of Temporary Loan Certificates, for the purpose of Redeeming and Retiring the remainder of the outstanding Compound-Interest Notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the sole purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the compound-interest notes outstanding, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue an additional amount of temporary loan certificates, not exceeding twenty-five millions of dollars; said certificates to bear interest at the rate of three per centum per annum, principal and interest payable in lawful money on demand, and to be similar in all respects to the certificates authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the payment of compound-interest notes," approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven; and the said certificates may constitute and be held by any national bank holding or owning the same as a part of the reserve, in accordance with the provisions of the above-mentioned act of March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

CHAP. CCXXXVIII.—An Act to create an Additional Land District in the State of Minnesota.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish an additional land district in the State of Minnesota, embracing all that part of the present northwestern land district which lies north of township number one hundred and twenty-four north, and west of range number thirty-five west of the fifth principal meridian, and to fix, from time to time, the boundaries thereof, which district shall be named after the place at which the office shall first be established; and the President shall have power to fix, from time to time, the location of the office for such district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver for said land district, who shall be required to reside at the site of the land office for said district, who shall be subject to the same laws and responsibilities, and whose compensation respectively shall be the same as that now allowed by law to other land officers in said State.

CHAP. CCXXXIX.—An Act to Incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That John D. Defrees, William E. Chandler, Samuel Wilkeson, E. A. Rollins, Nathan G. Starkweather, John A. Wills, Frank Turk, Adam S. Pratt, Henry C. Swain, and all the other persons who shall hereafter become stockholders in the company incorporated, are hereby created a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance on lives, and to make all and every insurance appertaining thereto, or connected therewith; and to grant, purchase, and dispose of annuities in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and elsewhere, and shall and may have perpetual succession, and shall be capable in law of contracting and being contracted with, and of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded in the district and circuit court of the United States, either in law or equity in this District or elsewhere; and they and their successors shall and may have a common seal, and may change the same at their will and pleasure, and may also from time to time, at any meeting of their directors, by a majority of votes, as hereinafter provided, ordain, establish, and put in execution such by-laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations, the same not being contrary to this act or the laws of the United States, as may appear to them necessary or expedient for the management of said corporation, its business and affairs, and may from time to time alter or repeal the same or any of them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall consist of ten thousand shares of stock of the value of one hundred dollars each, being one million of dollars, with the privilege to increase the same from time to time by a vote of the stockholders at any annual or special meeting, and the incorporators, or a majority of them named in the first section of this act, shall have power to receive subscriptions to the stock of the company, at such time and places as they may deem expedient; and when the whole amount of stock shall have been subscribed, and twenty per centum thereon shall have been paid in, (which payment shall be required at the time of subscribing,) the stockholders shall elect twelve directors to serve until the next annual election, or until their successors shall be duly elected and qualified; and the directors so elected of said company when it shall have been organized, may, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to have and to exercise in the name and behalf of the company, all the rights and privileges which are intended to be hereby given. Upon commencing active business, the directors shall have power to require payment of the amount remaining unpaid on the stock of the company, at such time and in such proportions as they may think proper: Provided, That the whole amount shall be required within two months from the time of commencing active business, and under the penalty, in case of non-payment as required, of forfeiture to the company of such stock and all previous payments thereon; and should the capital stock at any time be increased, the stockholders at the time of such increase shall be entitled to a pro rata share of such increase upon the payment of the par value of the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any certificate or obligation issued by the company, agreeing to purchase one of its policies for a fixed sum during a stated period, when accompanied by the policy duly assigned or transferred, shall be negotiable, and shall convey title to the policy to the party to whom it may be so assigned or transferred.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any policy taken out in favor of a wife, child, relative or other person having a beneficial interest in the life of the insured, shall not be liable to seizure by the creditors of the person so insured: Provided, That the policy does not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said corporation to purchase, hold, and convey real estate as follows:

First. Such as shall be requisite for its immediate accommodation in the convenient transaction of its business; or,

Second. Such as shall have been mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for loans previously contracted for moneys due; or,

Third. Such as shall have been conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted, in the course of its dealings; or,

Fourth. Such as shall have been purchased at sales upon judgments, decrees, or mortgages obtained or made for such debts.

The said corporation shall not purchase, hold, or convey real estate in any other case or for any other purpose; and all such real estate as shall not be necessary for the accommodation of said company, in the convenient transaction of its business, shall be sold and disposed of within six years after the said company shall have acquired title to the same; and it shall not be lawful for the said company to hold such real estate for a longer period than that above mentioned.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall have power to invest the capital stock and accumulated profits or surplus funds of the said company in such securities and in such manner as they may elect; but the stockholders of this company shall not be liable for any loss, damage, or responsibility beyond the amount of stock subscribed by them respectively; and any profits accruing therefrom and undivided, and the premium reserve, or reinsurance fund, shall be invested in, or loaned upon, the following securities, and no other:

First. The real estate, as herein described.

Second. Bonds and mortgages on unencumbered real estate, worth, in each case, at least double the amount loaned.

Third. Stocks of the United States of America.

Fourth. Stocks of the several States, and of incorporated cities therein.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall be elected annually by the stockholders on the second Tuesday of March, and they shall elect from their number, at the first meeting of the board after their election, a president and a vice president, and shall have power to appoint a cashier and a secretary, and such other officers, clerks, and agents as the business of the company may require, and to fill vacancies occasioned by death or resignation in said board. All elections for directors shall be by ballot, and every stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of the stock held by him, but no person shall be eligible as director who is not a stockholder to the amount of twenty shares.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That ten days' notice shall be given by publication in two papers, published in the city of Washington, of the time and place of the annual election, which election shall be conducted by three stockholders, who shall be appointed for that purpose by the board of directors at their previous stated meeting, one of whom shall act as judge, and the other two as inspectors.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have power to declare such dividends of the profits of the company as they may deem proper: Provided, That no dividend shall be declared when the capital stock would be impaired thereby.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the office of the company shall be located in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and said company may establish branches or agencies elsewhere, subject to the laws of the States respectively in which they may be established.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time alter or amend this act of incorporation.

CHAP. CCXLI.—An Act to confirm the Title to certain Lands in the State of Nebraska.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Secretary of the Interior, has finally decided in favor of preemption settlers or the locators of Indian or half-breed scrip, and issued patents to them for lands within the corporate limits of the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, the right and title of the patentee or patentees shall not be defeated or impaired because such land was within the said corporate limits, but if good in every other respect the title shall be good and valid notwithstanding such lands may have been within the said corporate limits, and notwithstanding the entry thereof, by any preemptor, or locator of Indian or half-breed scrip, was forbidden by the tenth section of the act of September fourth, eighteen hundred and forty-one, because so within said limits: Provided, That the following tracts of lands, to wit: the north half of the northwest quarter of section fifteen; the west half of the southwest quarter of section ten; the east half of the southeast quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section nine; township fifteen north of range thirteen east of the sixth principal meridian, are hereby excepted from the operation of this act.

CHAP. CCXLII.—An Act authorizing the Trustees of Union Chapel, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the City of Washington, to Mortgage their Property for church purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That George Reinhardt, John Byram, John B. Hines, William Worth, and George T. McGlue, trustees of Union Chapel of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, are hereby authorized to execute and deliver a mortgage on lot number twenty-eight and lot number twenty-nine, in square number one hundred and one, belonging to said church in said city, in order thereby to enable said trustees to procure money for the purpose of erecting a parsonage on said lots, and otherwise improving said lots, for the use and benefit of said church, in manner and form as the legally-constituted authorities of said church shall prescribe and direct.

APPROVED, July 25, 1868.

CHAP. CCXLIII.—An Act to extend the Time for the Construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad in the State of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of the State of California shall, instead of the times now fixed by law for the construction of the first section of its road and telegraph line, have until the first day of July, eighteen hundred and seventy, for the construction of the first thirty miles, and they shall be required to construct at least twenty miles every year thereafter, and the whole line of the road within the time now provided by law.

APPROVED, July 25, 1868.

CHAP. CCXLIII.—An Act providing for the Sale of the Arsenal Grounds at Saint Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to sell, at such time and in such manner as he may deem most advantageous to the interests of the Government, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the following military reservations and public property, namely:

The ground now occupied by the Saint Louis arsenal, in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, except the westernmost six acres thereof, and that occupied by the United States arsenal situated at Liberty, Missouri, together with such buildings, machinery, and other property appertaining thereto as cannot be advantageously employed in the construction or improvement of other arsenals or military posts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the ground occupied by the Saint Louis arsenal, except the westernmost six acres thereof, shall be divided into blocks and lots of convenient size for building purposes, with public streets, conforming, as near as may be without detriment to the interests of the Government in the sale, to the public streets of the city of Saint Louis adjoining said grounds; a plat of this division made in accordance with the laws of the State of Missouri, shall be filed with the proper officer in the city of Saint Louis; and the said lots shall be sold separately, at public auction, to the highest bidder, after thirty days' notice by advertisement in at least three daily papers in the city of Saint Louis; payment to be made one third in cash, the remainder in one and two years, with six per cent. interest per annum, secured by deed of trust on the lots sold. The stone wall surrounding said arsenal shall be sold in sections not exceeding one hundred feet in length.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the westernmost six acres of the tract of ground occupied by the said Saint Louis arsenal is hereby granted to the city of Saint Louis, to be by it held as a public ground forever, open to the use of the public as a place of public resort, and for no other use whatever, and without any power in said city to make any disposition of the same, or any part thereof, for any private use whatever: Provided, however, That this grant is upon the express condition that the said city or the association formed and now existing in the State of Missouri for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Brigadier General Nathaniel Lyon, shall, within three years after the passage of this act, complete the erection upon the said six acres of such a monument, upon a plan and of a character to be approved by the President of the United States; in default whereof this grant shall be null and void.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the grounds occupied by the Liberty arsenal shall be sold at public auction, after due notice by public advertisement of the time and place of said sale, in such parcels, blocks, and lots as may be deemed most advantageous to the interest of the Government, by the Secretary of War, upon the terms and conditions as to payment specified in the previous section.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all proceeds of the sale of all property provided for in this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the machinery, ordnance stores, and arms that the Government desires to reserve from sale, shall be stored at any arsenal now established or to be established by law.

APPROVED, July 25, 1868.

CHAP. CCXLV.—An Act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its Discontinuance.

of Freedmen and Refugees shall continue to be discharged by the present Commissioner of the bureau, and in case of vacancy in said office occurring by reason of his death or resignation the same shall be filled by appointment of the President on the nomination of the Secretary of War, and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no officer of the Army shall be detailed for service as Commissioner or shall enter upon the duties of Commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners, agents, clerks, and assistants shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau. In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate, the duties of Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the bureau shall, on the first day of January next, cause the said bureau to be withdrawn from the several States within which said bureau has acted and its operations shall be discontinued. But the educational department of the said bureau and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, shall be continued as now provided by law until otherwise ordered by act of Congress.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

B. F. WADE,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
 July 25, 1868.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

Attest:

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
 July 25th, 1868.

The House of Representatives having proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the bill entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States, with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, with the message of the President returning the bill—

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Attest:

EDWD. MCPHERSON,
Clerk H. R. U. S.

CHAP. CCXLVI.—An Act to further Amend the Postal Laws.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when any writer of a letter, on which the postage is prepaid, shall indorse in writing or in print upon the outside thereof his name and address, the same, after remaining uncalled [uncalled] for at the post office to which it is directed thirty days, or the time the writer may direct, shall be returned to the said writer without additional postage, whether a specific request for such return be indorsed on the letter or not.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all persons who receive money orders shall be required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, viz.: for one dollar or any sum not exceeding twenty dollars, a fee of ten cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving said order; for all orders exceeding twenty dollars and not exceeding thirty dollars, the charge shall be fifteen cents; for all orders exceeding thirty dollars and not exceeding forty dollars, the fee shall be twenty cents; for all orders exceeding forty dollars and not exceeding fifty dollars, the fee shall be twenty-five cents; and furthermore that the compensation of deputy postmasters for the payment of money orders is hereby increased from one eighth to one fourth of one per centum on the gross amount of orders paid at their respective offices, and that nothing contained in any act shall be so construed as to deprive postmasters at money-order offices of the compensation for transacting the money-order business fixed by the act of May seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and modified as stated in this section: Provided always, That the amount of such annual compensation, together with the postmaster's salary, shall not in any case exceed the salary established by law for postmasters of the first class.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section thirty-five of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, shall be so construed as to permit weekly newspapers, properly folded and addressed, when sent to regular subscribers, in the county where printed and published, to be delivered free of postage, when deposited at the office nearest to the office of publication; but nothing in this act shall be so construed as to require carriers to distribute said papers, unless postage is paid upon them at the rate of five cents per quarter, and such postage must be prepaid for a term of not less than one quarter or more than one year, either at the office of mailing or of delivery, at the option of the subscriber.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case of the loss of a money order, a duplicate thereof shall be issued by the superintendent of the money-order office without charge, on the application of the remitter or payee of the original: Provided, That the applicant furnish a certificate from the postmaster on whom the same was drawn that it had not been and would not thereafter be paid, and a similar certificate from the postmaster by whom it was issued that it had not been and would not be repaid to the purchaser; and a second fee shall not be charged for a duplicate money order issued to replace an order that has been rendered invalid because of non-presentation for payment within one year after its date, or because of illegal indorsements.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely forge or counterfeit, or willingly aid, assist, or abet in falsely forging or counterfeiting, or shall procure, directly or indirectly, to be falsely forged or counterfeited any postal money order, or any material signature or indorsement to any postal money order issued by the Post Office Department, or any of its agents, for the purpose and with the intent of obtaining or receiving, directly or indirectly, or of procuring or enabling others to obtain or receive, directly or indirectly, any sum or sums of money, and thereby to defraud either the United States or any person of such sum or sums of money, or any part thereof, or shall pass, utter, or publish or attempt to pass, utter, or publish as true, any such forged or counterfeited postal money order with intent to defraud either the United States or any person of any sum or sums of money, knowing such postal money order, or any signature or indorsement thereon, to be so falsely forged or counterfeited, every such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and being thereof duly convicted shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for a period of not less than two years nor more than five years, and to be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint and employ on board of each of the mail steamers plying on the route between

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Laws of the United States.

San Francisco, Japan, and China, and between San Francisco and Honolulu, (Hawaiian Islands,) a Government agent in charge of the United States mails, at an annual salary of two thousand dollars each per annum.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish in connection with the United States mail steamship service to Japan and China a general postal agency at Shanghai, China, with such branch agencies at other ports in China and Japan as shall, in his judgment, be necessary for the prompt and efficient management of the postal service in those countries; and to pay the postal agents so appointed and employed a reasonable compensation for their services, in addition to the necessary expenses for rent, furniture, clerk hire, and so forth, to be allowed at each agency for conducting the postal business, a report on which shall be embraced in the annual report of the Postmaster General.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That for the more efficient management of the increased postal business connected with the foreign mail service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint in his Department a superintendent of foreign mails at an annual salary of three thousand dollars, and also three additional clerks for that branch of the postal service, to wit: one of class four, and two of class three; and that the salary of the superintendent of the money-order system shall be three thousand dollars per annum.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, a chief of division for the dead-letter office, at a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, if any person employed in any department of the Post Office establishment of the United States shall, wilfully and knowingly, use or cause to be used in prepayment of postage any postage stamp or stamped envelope issued or which may hereafter be issued by authority of any act of Congress or of the Postmaster General which has already been once used for a like purpose, or shall remove or attempt to remove the canceling or defacing marks from any such postage stamp or stamped envelope with intent to use or cause the use of the same a second time, or to sell or offer to sell the same, or shall remove from letters or other mail matter deposited in or received at a post office the stamps attached to the same in payment of postage, with intent to use the same a second time for a like purpose, or to sell or offer to sell the same, every such offender shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than three years.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any person not employed in any department of the Post Office establishment of the United States shall commit any of the offenses described in the preceding section of this act, every such person shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than one year, or by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars for each offense, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That section nine of an act of Congress, approved July one, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, authorizing the sales of postage stamps and stamped envelopes at a discount, be so modified that the quantities of each sold at any one time to the same party shall not exceed one hundred dollars in value; and that such sales shall be restricted to certain designated agents who will agree to sell again without discount under rules to be fixed by the Postmaster General.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to deposit in a post office, to be sent by mail, any letters or circulars concerning lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other similar enterprises offering prizes of any kind on any pretext whatever.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to establish a blank agency for the Post Office Department, to be located in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and to appoint one superintendent at an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars, one assistant superintendent at an annual salary of sixteen hundred dollars, and three other assistants at an annual salary of one thousand dollars each, and two laborers at an annual salary of seven hundred and twenty dollars each; and all other blank agencies are hereby abolished.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to conclude arrangements with the post departments of foreign countries, with which international postal conventions have been or shall be concluded, for the exchange of small sums of money by means of postal orders, the maximum amount of which shall not exceed that fixed by law for domestic money orders, at such rates of exchange and under such rules and regulations as he may deem expedient; and that the expense incurred in establishing and conducting such system of exchange may be paid out of the proceeds of the money-order business.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the proviso in section three of the act approved March three, eighteen hundred and twenty-five, entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall repeal any of the provisions of the act approved July eleven, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "An act in relation to the Post Office Department."

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if on the final settlement of the account of any postmaster it shall appear that such postmaster is indebted to the United States, and suit shall not be instituted within three years after the close of such account, then, and in that case, the sureties on the bond of such postmaster shall not be liable to the United States.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That copies of the quarterly returns of postmasters, and of any papers pertaining to the accounts in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, certified by him under his seal of office, shall be admitted as evidence in the courts of the United States in criminal prosecutions, in the same manner as the same are now admitted in civil cases, as provided in section fifteen of an act entitled "An act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," approved July second, eighteen hundred and thirty-six.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That in all suits for the recovery of balances due from postmasters, a copy, duly certified under the seal of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, of the statement of any postmaster, special agent, or other person employed by the Postmaster General or the said Auditor for that purpose, that he has mailed a letter to such delinquent postmaster at the post office where the indebtedness accrued, or at his last and usual place of abode, and that a sufficient time has elapsed in the ordinary course of mail to have reached its destination, and has not received payment of such balance within the time designated in his instructions, shall be received as sufficient evidence in the courts of the United States or other courts that a demand has been made on such delinquent postmaster: Provided, nevertheless, That when the account of a late postmaster has been once adjusted and settled, and a demand made for the balance appearing to be due, and afterwards allowances shall be made or credits entered on the account, it shall not be necessary to make a further demand for the new balance found to be due.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to prescribe a uniform dress to be worn by the letter carriers at the several free delivery offices, and that any person not connected with this branch of the service who shall wear the uniform that may be prescribed in accordance herewith, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not more than one hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court before which such conviction shall be had.

CHAP. CCXLVII.—An Act making an Appropriation of Money to carry into effect the Treaty with Russia of March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

Whereas the President of the United States, on the thirtieth of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and the Senate thereafter gave its advice and consent to said treaty, by the terms of which it was stipulated that, in consideration of the cession by the Emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the Emperor of Russia the sum of seven million two hundred thousand dollars in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas said stipulations cannot be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary: Therefore,

CHAP. COXLIX.—An Act concerning the Rights of American Citizens in Foreign States.

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign States, owing allegiance to the Governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore, struction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situations and circumstances:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress.

CHAP. CCL.—An Act to establish a new Land District in the State of Nebraska.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of the Omaha land district in the State of Nebraska included within the following limits, to wit: on the east by the line dividing ranges six and seven east; on the north by the line dividing townships twenty and twenty-one north; on the south by the south bank of the Platte river; and on the west by the west boundary of the State, shall constitute an additional land district, to be called the "Grand Island" district, the location of the office for which shall be designated by the President of the United States, and shall by him, from time to time, be changed as the public interest may seem to require.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for said land district, who shall be required to reside at the site of their office, have the same powers, responsibilities, and emoluments, and be subject to the same acts and penalties which are or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land offices in said State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to cause the public lands in said district, with the exception of such as may have been or may be reserved for other purposes, to be exposed to sale in the same manner and upon the same terms and conditions as other public lands of the United States: Provided, That all sales and locations made at the office of the old district of lands situated within the limits of the new district which shall be valid and right in other respects up to the day on which the new office shall go into operation, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed.

CHAP. CCLX.—An Act to provide for an American Line of Mail and Emigrant Passenger Steamships between New York and one or more European Ports.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General is empowered and hereby authorized to contract with the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, under a special charter passed by the Legislature of said State under the date of April twenty-three, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, for the weekly or semi-weekly conveyance of all European and foreign mails of the United States between New York and Bremen, touching at Southampton, England, or Liverpool, touching at Queenstown, in first-class sea-going steamships, to be constructed in the United States and owned by said company, for a term not exceeding fifteen years, in the manner and on the conditions hereafter stated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said navigation company shall, with a purpose of performing the above service, build, contract, and fit out, within one year from the passage of this act, at least seven first-class sea-going steamships, five of which shall not be of less than three thousand tons each, Government measurement, and two others of not less than two thousand tons each, all of which vessels shall be constructed in the best manner, under the supervision and inspection of the American Lloyds, or, if ordered by the Postmaster General, under the inspection of the most competent engineer, to be detailed for this purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, upon a written application of the Postmaster General, so that when completed each vessel shall be of the first class in every respect, and with all known modern improvements in model, machinery, and outfit, so as to secure the greatest possible speed and safety; which steamships, when so constructed, shall be organized into and compose the United States mail steamship line, for the proper conveyance of mails and passengers, as hereinafter provided; the time of sailing, and all other details, to be arranged and agreed upon between the said company and the Postmaster General, with power to modify such agreements, from time to time, as may best promote the object in view: Provided, That no letters or mail matter shall be detained for the purpose of being sent by this line: And provided further, That the average rate of speed of the steamships of the said navigation company shall not be less than that of the steamships of other lines upon the same or similar routes, and if for the space of three months the trips successively of the steamships of said company shall be made in longer time than that employed by other steamships as aforesaid, then any contract made under the provisions of this act shall cease and determine at the pleasure of the Government of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the compensation for carrying and transporting the mails by sea, as herein provided, shall be agreed upon, and shall be in conformity with the act of Congress, approved June fourteen, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, and shall in no event or contingency exceed the sum therein provided, being all postage on letters, newspapers, and all other matter transported by or in the mails carried by said navigation company, shall belong to said company, and shall be paid to said navigation company quarterly, or applied to their use or benefit, as hereinafter provided: Provided, That when the receipts of said navigation company from sea postages, under any contract to be made in pursuance of this act, shall equal or exceed the sum of four hundred thousand dollars per annum, then the right of said company to receive the inland postages shall cease and determine, and said company shall only receive the sea postages:

Laws of the United States.

Provided, That such postages shall not exceed six hundred thousand dollars per annum after the discontinuance of said inland postage.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That to insure the construction of the above-mentioned vessels within the time, and in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the maintenance of the said line, the said Commercial Navigation Company may issue bonds to such an amount that the entire annual interest thereon shall not exceed the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, such bonds to be made payable at the expiration of the before-named fifteen years, and the interest thereof to be made payable semi-annually, the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in coin of the United States. That for the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department, and certified by the chief clerk of the Department, without liability for the payment of the interest or principal of said bonds upon the part of the Post Office Department only in manner as hereinafter provided. And the Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postage earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-named bonds, and shall retain the surplus after paying such interest, and shall invest the same quarterly in the securities of the United States to form a sinking fund, to be held solely for the benefit of the bondholders, and to be applied to the payment of the principal of such bonds. And whenever, and as soon as such sinking fund shall equal in amount the entire principal of said bonds, then from that time forward the interest of said bonds shall be paid out of the income of such sinking fund, and the principal thereof out of the same fund at their maturity. And all postage earned after the time when said sinking fund shall be made up to the amount aforesaid shall belong to and be paid quarterly to the said company by the Postmaster General of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid mail steamships shall be commanded and officered only by citizens of the United States, shall mount an armament, if required, of two guns each, and shall have at least one apprentice to be instructed in engineering, seamanship, and navigation, for every two hundred tons of registered tonnage for each steamship; and the Government of the United States shall have the power to take and use the aforesaid mail steamships as transports or for ships of war whenever, in the opinion of the President, the exigencies of the United States may require them, who is authorized, in such an event, to take said mail steamers and pay said company a just and equitable sum for their use, or purchase the same, as may be deemed most for the interest of the United States; said payment, whether for purchase or use, to be made to the Postmaster General, who shall pay to said navigation company whatever balance be due them, after deducting sufficient for payment for all the before-named registered bonds, the amount of which in this event shall be paid to the holders thereof at maturity of the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the foreign mail agents of the Government of the United States shall have free passage on the ships of the said Commercial Navigation Company whenever the Postmaster General to such foreign mail agents issues passes certifying to the said company that such is their official character.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said navigation company shall keep up and maintain for a period of twenty years, for the said United States mail service, at least the said number of seven first-class steamships.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the rights and privileges herewith granted shall be and remain to this company, and in no event shall this company transfer or assign the rights and privileges herein granted, nor shall it be lawful for any officer of the Government hereafter to recognize any assignment or transfer, it being the intent and meaning of this act to secure an American line of steam vessels for the transportation of mails and the proper conveyance of emigrant passengers between the port of New York and the European ports above named; and Congress may at any time hereafter, during the period of fifteen years, terminate or abandon any contract of the United States made with such company, and, having a due regard to the accrued rights of the said company, alter, repeal, or amend this act, and it shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXI.—An Act relating to the Alexandria Canal.

Whereas by an act of Congress, on the twenty-sixth day of May, eighteen hundred and thirty, the Alexandria Canal Company was incorporated, and authorized and empowered to construct, operate, and maintain a canal from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, with an aqueduct across the Potomac river at Georgetown; and whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, passed on the sixteenth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, the board of public works was authorized to unite with the corporate authorities of the city of Alexandria in making disposition of the Alexandria canal, in order to repair and make said canal available; and whereas said board of public works did, in pursuance of said authority, so unite with said corporate authorities, and did by their joint vote, and a vote of the majority of the stockholders of said canal company, empower and direct the president and directors of the said canal company to lease the said canal for the period of ninety-nine years; and whereas the said president and directors, in pursuance of said authority, did, on the sixteenth day of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, grant, lease, and convey the said canal, its aqueduct, locks, banks, lands, gates, and property of all description to Henry H. Wells, Philip Quigley, and William W. Dungan, the grantees therein named; and whereas afterward, and by an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, on the seventeenth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, the said lease was ratified and affirmed, and the lessees were further authorized and empowered to build, operate, and maintain a new aqueduct, and in conjunction therewith a railroad and a road bridge across said piers, and build, operate, and maintain a railroad from Georgetown to Alexandria; and whereas the said lessees have entered into possession of and repaired the said canal, and have erected a new aqueduct across the said Potomac river upon the said piers connecting the Chesapeake and Ohio canal with the said Alexandria canal: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said aqueduct across the Potomac river from Georgetown to the Virginia shore, and so connecting the said canals, is hereby declared to be a lawful structure in its present position and elevation, anything in any law or laws of the United States, or of any State, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said lessees, their associates, their heirs, and assigns, are hereby authorized and empowered to maintain and operate said aqueduct, and to erect, build, operate, and maintain across the Potomac river from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the Virginia shore, upon and over the stone piers upon which the aqueduct now rests, in conjunction therewith, a bridge of wood, iron, or stone, with one or more ways for the passage of persons, animals, and vehicles; and also with one or more tracks or ways for the passage of engines and cars, with such other conveniences as are usual or necessary for a railroad.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates and successors, to lay out, construct, maintain, and operate a railroad across said bridge from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the Virginia shore, and there to connect with said railroad.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the chief engineer of the Army shall certify to the Secretary of War that the said bridge is so far completed as to be ready, fit, and convenient for the passage of persons, animals, and vehicles, the said lessees, their successors, and their legal representatives, may demand, have, and receive, in advance, the following tolls, to wit: for any foot passenger crossing on said bridge, two cents; for any horse, mule, or jack, any ox, or other horned cattle, five cents; for any vehicle drawn by one animal, fifteen cents; drawn by two animals, twenty-five cents; drawn by four animals, thirty-five cents, but no extra charge shall be made for the driver of such vehicle; for any hog, sheep, or other live creature, one cent; which certificate shall be published for three weeks in two daily papers in the city of Washington at the expense of the company: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful for said lessees to commute those rates to persons requiring yearly passes; which said rates, or other lower rates to be by them prescribed from time to time, the said lessees may demand in advance, or may sue for, have, and receive, of and from any person who shall pass over said bridge, or who shall send, ride, or drive any animal or vehicle over the said bridge without first paying said tolls. And any person who shall attempt to injure said bridge, or to pass over the same, or to pass his animals over it, without first paying the tolls prescribed herein, or shall attempt to force said bridge, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than ten dollars for each offense, to be recovered in any court having jurisdiction of misdemeanors in the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That a conviction for such misdemeanor shall not in any wise be a bar to any suit brought to recover damages for an injury to said bridge: Provided, however, That said bridge is open and free for the passage of troops and munitions of war by the United States without charge or compensation of any kind.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case the said bridge shall not be fully completed within five years from the passage of this act, then this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That said company shall not grant to any railroad or other corporation the exclusive right to transfer passengers or freight over said railroad bridge, but any privilege granted to one corporation shall be extended to all who may make application for such privilege on equal terms; and shall not sell, transfer, or lease their corporate rights to any company that will not check baggage or commute fares with all railroads north or south.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the right is hereby reserved to Congress to amend, alter, or repeal this act.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXII.—An Act making Appropriations for the Service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing Additional Regulations for the Government of the Institution, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums

Laws of the United States.

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out [of] any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb:

For the support of the institution, in addition to the existing appropriation to meet the increased expense of maintaining pupils whose admission was authorized by an act of Congress, approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, three thousand dollars.

For continuing the work upon buildings of the institution, in accordance with the plans heretofore submitted to Congress, forty-eight thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the directors whose appointment has heretofore been provided for by law, there shall be three other directors appointed in the following manner: one Senator by the President of the Senate, and two Representatives by the Speaker of the House; these directors to hold their offices for the term of a single Congress, and to be eligible to a reappointment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no part of the real or personal property now held or hereafter to be acquired by said institution shall be devoted to any other purpose than the education of the deaf and dumb, nor shall any portion of the real estate be aliened, sold, or conveyed, except under the authority of a special act of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of February sixteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, as allows the payment of one hundred and fifty dollars per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each pupil admitted by order of the Secretary of the Interior, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the number of students in the collegiate department from the several States, as authorized by the act of March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, shall be increased from ten to twenty-five in number.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine:

Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

For the support, clothing, medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, including five hundred dollars for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, ninety thousand five hundred dollars.

For finishing, furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main hospital edifice, seven thousand dollars.

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

For the support of the institution, including one thousand dollars for books and illustrative apparatus, twelve thousand five hundred dollars.

For the proper inclosure, improvement, and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, three thousand six hundred dollars.

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum.

For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from independent or pay patients, fifteen thousand dollars.

For the completion of the Providence Hospital in Washington city, District of Columbia, thirty thousand dollars: Provided, That all expenditures for the said Providence Hospital under appropriations of Congress shall be made under the direction and control of the Surgeon General of the Army, whose duty it shall be to report at the December session of every Congress a full and complete statement of all expenses incurred under and by virtue of appropriations made by Congress.

For the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, ten thousand dollars.

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, twelve thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said contract shall be made by the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall report to the December session of every Congress, stating with whom the said contract is made, and the amount and nature thereof.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the superintendent of the said Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb shall, at the commencement of every December session of Congress, make a full and complete statement of all the expenditures made by virtue of any appropriations by Congress. Said statement shall include the amount paid to said superintendent, and also for teachers, to whom paid, and the rate at which paid; and all expenditures for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in-Asylum shall be under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall also report to Congress, at every December session, a full and accurate account of all expenditures made by said asylum out of appropriations by Congress; and all accounts for all appropriations made by Congress for charitable purposes and for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. But nothing herein contained shall take from the Secretary of the Interior the jurisdiction he now has over the subject of charities and charitable institutions in the District of Columbia.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXIII.—An Act making Appropriations for certain Executive Expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, viz.:

That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of twenty thousand two hundred dollars, for the employment of temporary clerks in the Indian Bureau, to be employed at the following rates: one clerk, at sixteen hundred dollars per annum; six clerks, at fourteen hundred dollars each per annum; seven clerks, at twelve hundred dollars each per annum; and two female copyists, at nine hundred dollars each per annum; and the sum of ten thousand dollars for the employment of temporary clerks in the State Department; the said clerks so to be employed in said Department shall receive a compensation of twelve hundred dollars each per annum; and the sum of nine thousand dollars, or so much thereof as is necessary, is also appropriated to pay the salary, office expenses, and clerk hire of the surveyor general of Utah Territory, in accordance with provisions of act of July sixteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of five thousand dollars, to be expended, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, for the purpose of building an arched roadway over Tiber creek, on North Capitol street, leading to the Government Printing Office: Provided, [That] the city of Washington will appropriate sufficient additional amount to complete it.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Henry B. Ste. Marie, the sum of ten thousand dollars for services and information in the arrest of John H. Surratt, in the kingdom of Italy, charged with the crimes of conspiracy and murder; and the joint resolution for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie, approved July twentieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

CHAP. CCLXIV.—An Act relating to Pensions.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the laws granting pensions to the hereinafter-mentioned dependent relatives of deceased persons leaving neither widow or child entitled to pensions under existing laws, shall be so construed as to give precedence to such relatives in the following order, namely: first, mothers; secondly, fathers; thirdly, orphan brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age, who shall be pensioned jointly if there be more than one: Provided, That if, in any case, the said persons shall have left both father and mother who were dependent upon them, then on the death of the mother the father shall become entitled to a pension commencing from and after the death of the mother; and upon the death of the mother and father the dependent brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age shall jointly become entitled to such pension until they attain the age of sixteen years, respectively, commencing from and after the death of the party who, preceding them, would have been entitled to the same: And provided further, That no pension heretofore awarded shall be affected by anything herein contained.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to a pension by reason of wounds received, or disease contracted, in the service of the United States, subsequently to the passage of this act, unless the person who was wounded or contracted disease was in the line of duty; and, if in the military service, was at the time actually in the field, or on the march, or at some post, fort, or garrison; or if in the naval service was at the time borne on the books of some ship, or other vessel of the United States, at sea or in harbor, actually in commission, or was on his way, by the direction of competent authority, to the United States, or to some other vessel or naval station.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the acts approved April sixth, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and August twenty-third, eighteen hundred and forty-two, as requires that pensions remaining unclaimed for fourteen months after the same have become due, shall be adjusted at the office of the Third Auditor, is hereby repealed; and the failure of any pensioner to claim his or her pension for a period of three years after the same shall have become due, shall be deemed presumptive evidence that such pension has legally terminated by reason of the pensioner's death, remarriage, recovery from disability, or otherwise, and the pensioner's name shall be stricken from the rolls, subject to the right of restoration to the same on a new application, with evidence satisfactorily accounting for the failure to claim such pension.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, soldier, seaman, or enlisted man has died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow entitled to a pension, and a child or children under sixteen years of age by a former wife, each of said children shall be entitled to receive two dollars per month, to commence from the death of their father and continue until they severally attain the age of sixteen years, to be paid to the guardian of such child or children for their use and benefit: Provided, however, That in all cases where such widow is charged with the care, custody, and maintenance of such child or children, the said sum of two dollars per month for each of said children shall be paid to her for and during the time she is, or may have been, so charged with the care, custody, and maintenance of such child or children, subject to the same conditions, provisions, and limitations as if they were her own children by her said deceased husband.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where an increased pension has been or may hereafter be granted to any widow or guardian of the children under sixteen years of age of a deceased soldier or sailor under an act entitled "An act increasing the pensions of widows, and for other purposes," approved July twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, or any subsequent act, such widow, or the guardian of such children, shall not be deprived of such increase by reason of any child or children of such deceased soldier or sailor being the inmate of any home, orphan's asylum, or other public or private charitable institution organized for the care and education of soldiers' orphans under the laws of any of the States, or in any school or institution where such orphan may in whole or in part be maintained or educated at the expense of a State, or of the public.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all pensions which have been granted in consequence of death occurring or disease contracted, or wounds received, since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or may hereafter be granted, shall commence from the discharge or from the death of the person on whose account the pension has been or shall hereafter be granted: Provided, That the application for such pension has been, or shall hereafter be, filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto shall have accrued; except that applications by or in behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years of age may be filed after the expiration of the said five years, if previously thereto they were without guardians or other proper legal representatives.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That immediately upon the passage of this act, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to give public notice of the contents of the foregoing section, particularly at the offices of the several pension agencies; and upon any application by letter or otherwise for or on behalf of any person entitled to the benefit of its provisions, or upon any notification that such person is so entitled, to pay or cause to be paid to him all such arrears of pensions as he may be entitled to under the provisions of the said section; and no claim agent or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services in making application for the arrears of pension under this and the preceding section.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section eleven of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June six, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: "That if any officer, soldier, or seaman shall have died of wounds received or of disease contracted in the line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States, leaving a widow and a child or children under the age of sixteen years, and it shall be duly certified under seal, by any court having probate jurisdiction, that satisfactory evidence has been produced before such court that the widow aforesaid has abandoned the care of such child or children, or is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of the same, or on presentation of satisfactory evidence thereof to the Commissioner of Pensions, then no pension shall be allowed to such widow until said child or children shall have severally become sixteen years of age, any previous enactment to the contrary notwithstanding; and the child or children aforesaid shall be pensioned in the same manner as if no widow had survived the said officer, soldier, or seaman, and such pension may be paid to the regularly authorized guardian of such child or children."

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That section six of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June six, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be, and the same is hereby, amended and reenacted, so as to read as follows: that if any person entitled to a pension has died since March fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or shall hereafter die while an application for such pension is pending, leaving no widow and no child under sixteen years of age, his or her heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to which the applicant would have been entitled had the certificate been issued before his or her death.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the remarriage of any widow or dependent mother, otherwise entitled to a pension prior to the application therefor, or to the issue of a pension certificate to her, shall not debar her right to a pension for the period elapsing from the death of her husband or son, on account of whose services and death she may claim a pension, to her remarriage: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal or modify the fourth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts granting pensions," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the ninth section of an act approved July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled, "An act supplementary to 'An act to grant pensions,'" are hereby continued in force for five years from the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That section one of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June sixth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall be so construed as to secure to every person entitled by law before the passage of said act to a less pension than twenty-five dollars per month, who while in the military or naval service and in the line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, having only one eye, shall have lost the same, a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the third section of an act entitled "An act increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes," approved July twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall be so construed as to place all pensioners whose right thereto accrued subsequently to the war of the Revolution, and prior to the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, on the same footing, as to rate of pension, from and after the passage of said act, as those who have been pensioned under acts passed since said fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one; and the widows of revolutionary soldiers and sailors now receiving a less sum shall hereafter be paid at the rate of eight dollars per month.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That all officers in the military or naval service, of the rank of captain in the Army or lieutenant in the Navy, and of less rank, who have lost a leg or arm in such service and in the line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, shall be entitled to receive an artificial limb on the same terms as privates in the Army are now entitled to receive the same.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That in all cases pensions heretofore or hereafter granted by special acts of Congress shall be subject to be varied in amount according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXV.—An Act to pay for Indexing the Tax Bill.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled; That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, to the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means, one hundred dollars for preparing, by order of the House, a full index of the "Act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July twentieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXVI.—An Act to correct an Error in the Enrollment of the "Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the last clause of the first sentence of section forty-eight of the "Act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July twentieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, be amended so that it will read: "or three dollars per dozen bottles, each bottle containing not more than one pint," etc., instead of "each bottle containing more than one pint," etc.; the word "not" having been omitted in the enrollment of the act.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXVII.—An Act amendatory of an Act entitled "An Act granting Public Lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of Railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall and may be lawful for the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin to dispose of the lands granted and which may have inured and been certified to the State of Wisconsin under the act of Congress approved June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, to aid in the construction of a railroad "from Madison or Columbus, by way of Portage City, to the Saint Croix river or lake, between township twenty-five and thirty-one," and commonly known as La Crosse and Milwaukee-railroad, for the benefit of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, existing under and by virtue of the laws of Wisconsin: Provided, however, That this act shall apply only to such lands as may be due the State of Wisconsin for the portion of said road already completed.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXVIII.—An Act granting the Right of Way to certain Railway Companies over the Military Reservation at Fort Leavenworth.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, is hereby granted to the Leavenworth and Des Moines Railway Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Missouri, to construct and operate a railway across the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, on the east side of the Missouri river, upon a line to be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, is hereby granted to the Leavenworth, Atchison, and Northwestern Railway Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad across and over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, upon such line as shall be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That if the said company shall not construct, within one year from the passage of this act, a railway from the city of Leavenworth to the city of Atchison, then, and in that case, a like privilege is hereby conferred upon any other company that shall construct a railway between said cities.

CHAP. CCLXIX.—An Act donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation for the exclusive use of a Public Road.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a strip of land one hundred feet in width along the southern boundary of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, in the State of Kansas, extending from the Missouri river to the western boundary thereof, be set apart for the perpetual and exclusive use of a public road; and the said road shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charges upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time amend or repeal this act.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXX.—An Act regulating the Times and Places of holding the District and Circuit Courts of the United States for the Northern District of Florida.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the times and places of holding the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of Florida shall hereafter be as follows: at Jacksonville, on the first Monday of December; at Tallahassee, on the first Monday of February; and at Pensacola, on the first Monday of March.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the terms of the United States courts heretofore held at Saint Augustine and Apalachicola be hereafter discontinued.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXI.—An Act to disapprove an Act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory redistricting the Territory and reassigning the Judges thereto.

Territory and assigning the judges thereto," be, and the same is hereby, disapproved.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western Boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all Territory claimed by her exterior to said Boundaries, and of all her Claims upon the United States, and to establish a Territorial Government for New Mexico.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the aforesaid act shall be amended as follows: every bill which shall have passed the council and house of representatives of the said Territory shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory; if he approve he shall sign it, but if he do not approve it he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration, two thirds of that house shall pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that house it shall become a law, the Governor's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. But in such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and entered upon the journal of each house respectively. And if the Governor shall not return any bill presented to him for approval, after its passage by both houses of the Legislature, within three days, (Sundays excepted,) after such presentation, the same shall become a law in like manner as if the Governor had approved it: Provided, however, That the Assembly shall not have adjourned sine die, during the three days prescribed as above, in which case it shall not become a law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico shall be ex-officio superintendent of public buildings and grounds, and shall have all control and management of all public buildings now erected, in progress of erection, or to be hereafter erected, and of all grounds pertaining thereto; and he shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall establish such rules in relation to said public buildings and grounds as in his judgment he may devise, and for his services as such superintendent shall receive an annual salary of one thousand dollars, to take effect from and after the passage of this act; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of said Territory, upon the convening of the Legislature thereof, to administer the oath of office to the members-elect of the two houses and the officers thereof when chosen; and no other person shall be competent to administer said oath, save in the absence of the secretary; in which case any one member of either house may administer the oath to the presiding officer elect, and he shall administer the same to the members and other officers: Provided, That the annual salary of the secretary of said Territory shall be two thousand dollars per annum from and after the first day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXIII.—An Act to extend the Laws of the United States relating to Customs, Commerce, and Navigation over the Territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a Collection District therein, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation be, and the same are hereby, extended to and over all the mainland, islands, and waters of the territory ceded to the United States by the Emperor of Russia by treaty concluded at Washington on the thirtieth day of March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, so far as the same may be applicable thereto.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all of the said territory, with its ports, harbors, bays, rivers, and waters, shall constitute a customs collection district, to be called the district of Alaska, for which said district a port of entry shall be established at some convenient point to be designated by the President, at or near the town of Sitka or New Archangel; and a collector of customs shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside at the said port of entry, and who shall receive an annual salary of two thousand five hundred dollars, in addition to the usual legal fees and emoluments of the office. But his entire compensation shall not exceed four thousand dollars per annum, or a proportionate sum for a less period of time.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to make and prescribe such regulations as he may deem expedient for the nationalization of all vessels owned by actual residents of said ceded territory on and since the twentieth day of June, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and which shall continue to have been so owned up to the date of such nationalization, and that from any deputy collector of customs upon whom there has been, or shall hereafter be, conferred any of the powers of a collector under and by virtue of the twenty-ninth section of the "Act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to require bonds in favor of the United States in such amount as the said Secretary shall prescribe for the faithful discharge of official duties by such deputy.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of fire-arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into and within the said Territory. And the exportation of the same from any other port or place in the United States when destined to any port or place in the said territory, and all such arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits, exported or attempted to be exported from any port or place in the United States and destined for such territory, in violation of any regulations that may be prescribed under this section; and all such arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits, landed or attempted to be landed or used at any port or place in said territory, in violation of said regulations, shall be forfeited; and if the value of the same shall exceed four hundred dollars, the vessel upon which the same shall be found, or from which they shall have been landed, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and cargo, shall be forfeited; and any person willfully violating such regulation shall, on conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than six months. And bonds may be required for a faithful observance of such regulations from the master or owners of any vessel departing from any port in the United States having on board fire-arms, ammunition, or distilled spirits, when such vessel is destined to any place in said territory, or if not so destined, when there shall be reasonable ground of suspicion that such articles are intended to be landed therein in violation of law; and similar bonds may also be required on the landing of any such articles in the said territory from the person to whom the same may be consigned.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the coasting trade between the said territory and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great districts.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to kill any otter, mink, marten, sable, or fur seal, or other fur-bearing animal, within the limits of said territory, or in the waters thereof; and any person guilty thereof shall, for each offense, on conviction, be fined in any sum not less than two hundred dollars nor more than one thousand, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court; and all vessels, their tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, found engaged in violation of this act, shall be forfeited: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to authorize the killing of any such mink, marten, sable, or other fur-bearing animal, except fur seals, under such regulations as he may prescribe; and it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to prevent the killing of any fur seal, and to provide for the execution of the provisions of this section until it shall be otherwise provided by law: Provided, That no special privileges shall be granted under this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That until otherwise provided by law, all violations of this act, and of the several laws hereby extended to the said territory and the waters thereof, committed within the limits of the same, shall be prosecuted in any district court of the United States in California or Oregon, or in the district courts of Washington, and the collector and deputy collectors appointed by virtue of this act, and any person authorized in writing by either of them, or by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have power to arrest persons and seize vessels and merchandise liable to fines, penalties, or forfeitures under this and the said other laws, and to keep and deliver over the same to the marshal of some one of the said courts; and said courts shall have original jurisdiction, and may take cognizance of all cases arising under this act and the several laws hereby extended over the territory so ceded to the United States by the Emperor of Russia, as aforesaid, and shall proceed therein in the same manner and with the like effect as if such cases had arisen within the district or Territory where the proceedings shall be brought.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of fine, penalty, or forfeiture, mentioned and embraced in the act entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," or mentioned in any act in addition or amendatory of said act, that have occurred or may occur in said collection district of Alaska, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, if in his opinion the said fine, penalty, or forfeiture was incurred without willful negligence or intention of fraud, to ascertain the facts in such manner and under such regulations as he may deem proper without regard to the provisions of the act above referred to, and upon the said facts so to be ascertained as aforesaid he may exercise all the power of remission conferred upon him by said act, as fully as he might have done had said facts been ascertained under and according to the provisions of said act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect all parts of this act, except those especially intrusted to the President alone; and the sum of fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated from any unappropriated money in the Treasury to carry this act into effect and meet the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs within the limits of the said territory.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXIV.—An Act authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York, now located in the city of New York, is hereby authorized to change its location to the city of Brooklyn. Whenever the stockholders representing three fourths of the capital of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and cashier shall execute a certificate under the corporate seal of the bank, specifying such determination, and shall cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location shall be effected, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the city of Brooklyn.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which the said bank may be a party or interested. And when such change shall have been determined upon as aforesaid, notice thereof and of such change shall be published in at least two daily newspapers in each of the counties of New York and Kings, in the State of New York, for not less than ten days.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXV.—An Act relating to the District Courts of Utah Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Governor of Utah Territory shall assign the district judges of said Territory to their respective districts, and appoint the time and place of holding court in each of said districts, not exceeding two terms in each district in any one year.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXVI.—An Act regulating Judicial Proceedings in certain Cases, for the protection of Officers and Agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful Claims.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the provisions of section eight of the act of July twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes," and the forms and modes by that section and the twelfth section of the act of March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, therein referred to, prescribed for prosecuting suits, withholding executions, and paying judgments against officers of the United States, or other persons engaged in executing the acts relative to captured and abandoned property, shall extend and be applied to all suits and proceedings (except those in behalf of the United States) which have been brought, or may hereafter be brought, against any officer or agent of the Government, civil or military, for acts done during the rebellion while acting by virtue or under color of his office or employment; and every defendant in such suit or proceeding having made full defense thereto, and having notified the Attorney General of the United States to appear and defend the same, shall be entitled to the full benefit and protection provided in said section for officers and agents of the Government engaged in the collection of the public revenue; and any defendant being aggrieved by any order or direction, certificate, ruling, or judgment of any court made or had in any such proceeding, may except thereto and appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States, and have the questions arising there heard and determined.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no action or suit shall be maintained in any court of the United States, or of any State thereof, in the name or in the behalf or interest of any alien, against the United States, or any person, for or on account of any act done or omitted to be done by such person as an officer or agent of the United States, in the administration of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March twelve, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, or of the act of Congress entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July two, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or in virtue or under color of the acts of Congress aforesaid, or any other acts of Congress relative to the said insurrectionary States, or to persons or property therein; and to any action or suit which may have been heretofore, or shall hereafter be, instituted by any alien against the United States, or any such person as aforesaid, on account of any act done or omitted to be done as aforesaid, the defendant may and shall plead or allege in bar thereof, that such act was done, or omitted to be done, in the administration of one of the acts of Congress aforesaid, or in virtue or under color thereof, and such plea or allegation, if the fact be sustained by the proof, shall be, and shall be deemed and adjudged in law to be, a complete and conclusive bar to any such suit or action: Provided, That this section shall not be construed so as to deprive aliens who are citizens or subjects of any Government which accords to citizens of the United States the right to prosecute claims against such Government in its courts, of the privilege of prosecuting claims against the United States in the court of claims, as now provided by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it is hereby declared to have been the true intent and meaning of the act approved March twelfth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," that the remedy given in cases of seizure made under said act, by preferring claim in the Court of Claims, should be exclusive, precluding the owner of any property taken by agents of the Treasury Department as abandoned or captured property in virtue or under color of said act from suit at common law, or any other mode of redress whatever, before any court or tribunal other than said Court of Claims; and in all cases in which suits of trespass, replevin, detinue, or any other form of action may have been brought and are now pending, or shall hereafter be brought against any person for or on account of private property taken by such person as an officer or agent of the United States, in virtue or under color of the act aforesaid, or the act approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," the defendant may and shall plead or allege in bar thereof that such act was done or omitted to be done by him as an officer or agent of the United States in the administration of one of the acts of Congress aforesaid, or in virtue or under color thereof, and such plea or allegation, if the fact be sustained by the proof, shall be, and shall be deemed and adjudged in law to be, a complete and conclusive bar to any such suit or action: Provided, however, That no judgment recovered in accordance with this act shall be paid by the United States unless the amount received by the defendant as the proceeds of the transaction which was the foundation of the suit shall have been paid into the Treasury, except upon an appropriation duly made therefor after a full examination of the claim upon its merits.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

RESOLUTIONS.

No. 1.—Joint Resolution in relation to the Printing of the Report of the Postmaster General.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to cause to be printed and bound three thousand copies of the report of the Postmaster General, instead of twenty-five hundred copies, as provided by the act approved July twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred [and] sixty-six, and that so much of that act as conflicts with the above provision be, and is hereby, repealed; and this resolution shall apply to the report for the present year.

APPROVED, December 20, 1867.

No. 2.—Joint Resolution changing the Time of holding the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time of holding the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad Company for the choice of directors is hereby changed from the first Wednesday in October to the first Wednesday following the fourth day of March, and the stockholders are authorized to determine the place at which such annual meeting shall be held at the last annual meeting of the stockholders immediately preceding such annual meeting: Provided, The same shall be held at either of the cities of New York, Washington, Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, or Saint Louis: And provided further, That on the election of directors herein provided for, to take place in March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, the terms of office of all persons then acting or claiming the right to act as directors of said company shall cease and determine.

APPROVED, December 20, 1867.

No. 3.—A Resolution in relation to the Erection of a Jail in the District of Columbia.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed and required to suspend for the period of forty days from the passage of this resolution all work upon the jail to be erected in the District of Columbia, under the act of Congress approved July twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and the amendment thereto, approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven; and that the Treasurer of the United States be directed to withhold for the period aforesaid the payment of any money appropriated for the erection of said jail.

APPROVED, January 11, 1868.

No. 4.—Joint Resolution in relation to the Sale of Stock in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to adjourn the sale of eight hundred shares of the stock owned by the United States in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company from the second day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, (to which day said sale now stands adjourned,) until Saturday, the eighth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

APPROVED, January 11, 1868.

No. 5.—A Resolution for the Appointment of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than members of Congress" be filled by the appointment of Theodore D. Woolsey of Connecticut, William B. Astor of New York, John Maclean of New Jersey, and Peter Parker of the city of Washington.

APPROVED, January 11, 1868.

No. 7.—Joint Resolution for the Relief of Destitute Persons in the South.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be hereby authorized to issue, for the relief of any and all classes of destitutes in the South, such desiccated potatoes and desiccated mixed vegetables as have accumulated during the war and are not needed for use in the Army; the same to be issued under the direction of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

APPROVED, January 31, 1868.

No. 8.—A Resolution limiting Contracts for Stationery and other Supplies in the Executive Departments to one year.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for any of the Executive Departments to make contracts for stationery or other supplies for a longer term than one year from the time the contract is made; and that whenever proposals for supplies have been solicited, the parties responding to such solicitation shall be duly notified of the time and place of opening the bids, and be permitted to be present either in person or by attorney, and a record of each bid shall then and there be made.

APPROVED, January 31, 1868.

No. 9.—Joint Resolution to provide for a Commission to examine and report on Meters for Distilled Spirits.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission, to consist of five persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby created, whose duty it shall be, in connection with the existing commission of the Academy of Science, to carefully examine all meters and mechanical contrivances or inventions that may be presented to them, intended to measure, test, and ascertain the productiveness of grain, or other articles prepared for distillation, or the actual quantity and strength of distilled spirits, subject to tax, produced therefrom, giving due notice of the times and places where such examination will be conducted; and that the commission shall meet and proceed to the performance of their duties, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the earliest practicable day, and shall report in detail to the said Secretary, to be communicated to Congress, the result of their examination, with such recommendation as they may deem expedient and most to the interest of the Government, on or before the first of March next.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That pending the action of said commission, and until their report be made and a meter shall be by law adopted, all work on the construction of meters, under the direction of the Treasury Department, be, and is hereby, suspended. And in the mean time no further contract for meters shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury under the fifteenth section of the act entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the expenses incident to the carrying out of this joint resolution, and also a reasonable compensation for the services of such of the said commissioners as are not now officers of the United States or members of the said academy.

APPROVED, February 3, 1868.

No. 10.—Joint Resolution providing for the Sale of Iron-Clads.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to dispose of such iron-clad vessels, except those of the "Dictator," "Kalamazoo," "Monadnock," and "Passaic" classes, as in his judgment are not required by the interests of the service, at a price to be determined by appraisal, to be made by a board of not less than five naval officers, two of whom shall be engineers; and report shall be made to Congress, as fast as said vessels are sold, of the amounts realized from such sales, and the parties to whom sold: Provided, That after such appraisal public notice shall be given that proposals will be received for thirty days for the purchase of said vessels; and that the highest price so proposed, being not less than the appraisal, shall be accepted: And provided further, That the proceeds of all such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

APPROVED, February 3, 1868.

No. 11.—Joint Resolution for Reducing the Expenses of the War Department, and for other purposes.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take immediate measures for the reduction of the expenses of the Army and of the War Department at and in the vicinity of New York city at as early a day as practicable, by concentrating the business of the quartermaster, commissary, clothing, ordnance, and medical bureaus, and recruiting service in said city, and that for this purpose there shall be hired and used at some convenient and proper point in said city one suitable building in which shall be accommodated all the offices connected with and required for the transaction of such public business, at a cost to the Government not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars per annum; and also a suitable building or property within the harbor of New York, or on the navigable waters thereof, which shall have sufficient accommodation of warehouse, pier, dock, and basin room for the safe and convenient receiving, storing, and care of all Army stores of every kind and description belonging to either of said bureaus or branches of the service, at an annual cost to the Government not exceeding fifty thousand dollars: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the storage or keeping of ordnance stores or other property at Governor's Island, or the use in any way for the purposes of the Government of any property or building which actually belongs to the United States.

APPROVED, February 21, 1868.

equipments as may be necessary for the purpose of guard duty at the asylums.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

B. F. WADE,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

Indorsed by the PRESIDENT: "Received 12th March, 1868."

[NOTE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The foregoing resolution having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, has become a law without his approval.]

No. 25.—Joint Resolution requiring certain Moneys of the United States to be paid into the Treasury, and for other purposes.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all moneys which have been received by any officer or employ[e] of the Government, or any Department thereof, from sales of captured and abandoned property in the late insurrectionary districts, under or under color of the several acts of Congress providing for the collection and sale of such property, and which have not already been actually covered into the Treasury, shall immediately be paid into the Treasury of the United States, together with any interest which has been received or accrued thereon.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That if any officer or person having the custody, possession or control of any money derived or arising from the sale or other disposition of any such property mentioned in the preceding section shall convert the same to his own use, or shall refuse or neglect for the space of thirty days next after the passage of this resolution to pay the same into the Treasury of the United States, or shall in anywise pay away or dispose of the same otherwise than by paying the same into the Treasury as aforesaid, shall be deemed and held guilty of embezzling the public money of the United States; and shall be punished therefor by imprisonment for a term of not more than ten years, and shall pay a fine equal to the sum so embezzled.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That a sum of the proceeds of such sales not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for the payment of the necessary expenses incurred by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury for incidental expenses in acting under the laws respecting the collection and disposition of captured and abandoned property, and for the necessary expenses of defending, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, such suits as have been brought against him or his agents in the premises, and for prosecuting suits in the United States for the recovery of such property, and for providing for the defense of the United States against suits for or in respect to such property in the Court of Claims.

APPROVED, March 30, 1868.

No. 28.—A Resolution for the appointment of a Commission to select suitable locations for Powder Magazines.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to select three competent officers of the Navy to constitute a commission, whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the practicability of securing more suitable sites for powder magazines than those now used in the vicinity of New York, Boston, and Portsmouth, New Hampshire; also to report the cost of procuring the said sites, and the probable expense of erecting magazines thereon.

APPROVED, May 19, 1868.

No. 30.—Joint Resolution concerning certain Lands granted to Railroad Companies in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a failure to grade twenty miles of the roads within two years from the passage of the act entitled "An act to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin," approved on the third day of March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and twenty miles additional thereof in each year thereafter, as required by said act, shall not cause any forfeiture or reversion to the United States of any lands granted to the said States, or either of them, to aid in the construction of the railroads described: Provided, That said companies, or either of them, shall fully complete their said railroads in the manner required by law on or before the thirty-first December, anno Domini eighteen hundred and seventy-two, at which time a failure shall forfeit the lands to the United States: Provided, [That] the provisions of this section shall apply only to the chartered and projected line of railway from the city of Fond du Lac, in the State of Wisconsin, northerly to Escanaba, in the State of Michigan, and the chartered and projected line of railway from Marquette, in the State of Michigan, westerly to Ontonagon, in the same State: And provided further, That if the said Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in the State of Michigan, shall not have completed according to law ten additional miles of their railroad on or before the first day of January, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, and shall not in like manner complete ten miles of said railroad in each and every year thereafter, then it shall be lawful for the Legislature of the said State of Michigan to declare the grant of lands to said company to be forfeited and to confer the said grant of lands upon some other company in the same manner as if the said grant was now for the first time made to the said State of Michigan.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause a patent, in due form of law, to be issued to the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, in pursuance of a resolution passed by Congress granting the same to the State of Wisconsin, approved April twenty-five, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and an act of the Legislature of Wisconsin, approved June sixteen, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-two, granting the same to said company for eighty acres of land of the Fort Howard military reserve, as the same was surveyed and approved by said Commissioner on the eleventh June, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

APPROVED, May 20, 1868.

No. 31.—Joint Resolution in relation to the Breakwater at Portland, Maine.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the breakwater in Portland harbor, Maine, as the chief engineer shall deem proper, may be expended under his direction in excavating the "middle ground" near said breakwater, and in otherwise protecting the channel from injury by filling and improving the same.

APPROVED, June 5, 1868.

No. 32.—Joint Resolution to supply Books and Public Documents to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives cause to be sent to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Dayton, Ohio, and to the branches at Augusta, Maine, and Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and the Soldier's Home at Knightstown Springs, near Knightstown, Indiana, each, one copy each of the following documents, namely: the Journals of each House of Congress at each and every session; all laws of Congress; the annual messages of the President, with accompanying documents; and all other documents or books which may be printed and bound by order of either House of Congress, including the Congressional Globe; beginning with the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

APPROVED, June 8, 1868.

No. 33.—Joint Resolution to provide for the removal of a Suit pending in the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, West Virginia, to the Circuit Court of the United States.

Whereas a suit of ejectment is now pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, in West Virginia, against the tenant in possession, to recover possession of the Harper's Ferry property, owned by the United States, and it is doubtful whether under any existing law of the United States the said suit can be removed to the circuit court of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, if in session, or of the judge thereof in vacation, on the application of the defendant in said suit, showing that the property sought to be recovered by the said suit is owned or claimed by the United States under color of title, and verifying the facts set out in such application by this [his] affidavit, to issue a writ by certiorari, directed to the said State court, directing it to send the record and proceedings in said suit to the said circuit court of the United States, a duplicate of which writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the said State court, or left at his office by the marshal of the said district, or his deputy or other person thereto duly authorized, and thereupon the said State court shall stay all further proceedings in said suit; and upon the return of the said writ, the said suit shall be docketed in the said circuit court of the United States, and there proceeded in according to law, and all further proceedings had therein in the said State court shall be null and void.

APPROVED, June 10, 1868.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

B. F. WADE,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 20, 1868.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

Attest: GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 20, 1868.

The House of Representatives having proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the bill entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States, with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, with the message of the President returning the bill—

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Attest:

No. 59.—A Resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American Register to the British-built Brig Highland Mary.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue an American register to the British-built brig Highland Mary, owned by H. and S. French, of Sag Harbor, New York.

No. 75.—A Resolution relative to Lighting the Streets of Washington City, District of Columbia.

Whereas the municipal authorities of the city of Washington have failed to carry out the arrangements for lighting the streets of said city, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved July twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax from the property holders of the city of Washington sufficient to defray the expenses of lighting the avenue and street lamps of said city with six-foot burners twenty-one nights in each month, from dark until daylight, and keep said lamps so lighted each year.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized to contract with the Washington Gas-Light Company for the term of one year, and so from year to year until otherwise provided by law, at such rates as may be agreed upon not exceeding the maximum now fixed by law, for all the illuminating gas required for the avenue and street lamps and public offices of the city and public grounds under the control of said city.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to increase from time to time, as the public good may require, the number of street lamps on any of the streets, lanes, alleys, public ways, and grounds, in the city of Washington, and to do any and all things pertaining to the well lighting of the city, and to levy and collect a tax from the property holders therefor.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That in the event of the failure of the mayor and city councils to levy and collect the tax herein authorized, or to light the said city as herein directed, then the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to levy a tax upon the property of said city, and to collect the same, sufficient to light said city for the current year, and so from year to year, in case of such failure of said mayor and city councils to light as herein directed, and to fully execute the provisions of this joint resolution in the place and stead of the said mayor and city councils.

SEC. 5. And be it further resolved, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relieve the said Washington Gas-Light Company from paying the internal revenue tax imposed by law.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

No. 76.—Joint Resolution in relation to Surveys and Examinations of Rivers and Harbors.

CHAP. CXCIX.—An Act to authorize the Sale of twenty acres of Land in the Military Reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

Whereas the Secretary of War, in behalf of the United States and in accordance with the previous practice of the War Department, on the thirteenth day of November, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty, did execute to Samuel Denman, William H. Russell, and Thomas Ewing, junior, and their assigns, a lease of twenty acres of land in the military reserve at Fort Leavenworth, State of Kansas, for the term of sixteen years thereafter, with a preference to them of an extension of the term, and with the exclusive right to mine for coal under the lands of said military reserve; and whereas the said lessees and their assigns accepted the said lease, and upon the faith thereof have prosecuted their mining operations under many difficulties at great expense, and have finally succeeded in striking the deep coal beds of that geological region after having expended their entire capital to the amount of forty thousand dollars; and whereas it is now discovered that the said lease is invalid because the Secretary of War was unauthorized in law to make the same, by reason of which the said lessees are deprived of their right to proceed, and are threatened with the total loss of their money, and are without redress; and whereas in view of the incalculable benefit to be derived, not alone by the State of Kansas, but by the whole country adjacent thereto, by the development of the coal strata of the region, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Kansas, on the eighteenth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, did concur in a joint resolution reciting the above, and respectfully requesting this Congress to act in the premises; and whereas the House of Representatives of the United States have heretofore passed an act directing the sale in small tracts of a body of land in said military reserve: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Leavenworth Coal Company, being the successors and assigns of Samuel Denman, William H. Russell, and Thomas Ewing, junior, in the lease aforesaid, shall have the right to purchase from the United States twenty acres of land lying in the military reserve at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and described as follows: beginning at the intersection of the south line of the military reserve and the Missouri river, running northwardly thence along the west line of the said Missouri river, thence westwardly in a line parallel to the south line of the military reserve, thence southwardly in a line at right angles with the south line of the military reserve, thence eastwardly in the said south line of the military reserve to the point of beginning, the said lines to be run so as to make the form of the said twenty acres as nearly square as practicable. The said Leavenworth Coal Company shall pay therefor the sum fixed by the United States district judges of the State of Kansas, the eastern district of Missouri, and of the northern district of Illinois, whose reasonable expenses shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and said lease is hereby extended sixteen years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon the payment of the purchase-money for the same, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to issue to the said Leavenworth Coal Company and its successors and assigns a patent for the above-described lands, which patent shall also grant to the said company and its successors and assigns, the exclusive right to mine for all coal underlying the lands now comprised in the military reserve aforesaid.

APPROVED, July 20, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXXVI.—An Act for the Relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Eliza Mascher,

Laws of the United States.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

administratrix of John F. Mascher, deceased, who obtained a patent No. 9611 for an improvement in daguerreotype cases, dated the eighth of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, with additional improvement, No. 184, annexed to said original patent, dated nineteenth of February, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, for fourteen years, which expired on the eighth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, be authorized to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of said patent for seven years, under the regulations now in force for the extension of patents, as if she had made application previous to its expiration, as required by law; and the Commissioner of Patents is directed to investigate and decide the application for extension on the same evidence and in the same manner as other applications for extension are decided: Provided, That the application for extension be made within thirty days after approval of this act, and the decision of the Commissioner be rendered within ninety days from the filing of said application in the Patent Office: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any person who may have manufactured or used the daguerreotype cases with the improvement and addition aforesaid, or used cases containing the improvement and addition aforesaid, between the expiration of the patent and the approval of this act: And provided also, That the Commissioner shall be satisfied before granting such extension that it will inure entirely to the benefit of the said Eliza Mascher.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

CHAP. CCLXXXVII.—An Act directing the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to hear Evidence and determine the Right of W. H. Cox, deceased, late a Sergeant in Company F, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Artillery, to a Pension in same manner as if he were still living, he having died of disease contracted whilst a Prisoner of War at Andersonville, Georgia, and, if found to be entitled to a Pension, then same, from time of his death, to be paid over to his father, Charles D. Cox.

Whereas W. H. Cox, a hale, hearty young man of about twenty years of age, residing with his father, Charles D. Cox, of Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, and being a part of his family, on the sixteenth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, was enrolled as a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to serve three years or during the war; that he was regularly mustered in as such, and at the battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia, on or about the second of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, was taken prisoner by the rebels and sent to Andersonville, Georgia, and there confined as a prisoner of war for the period of ten months, and from exposure and lack of food became very much debilitated, and after being released he was on the eighth of August, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by virtue of a telegram dated Adjutant General's Office, May twelfth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, honorably discharged from the United States service; and whereas the said W. H. Cox, after reaching his father's residence, made application for a pension under existing laws, in consequence of disease contracted in line of duty, and before the case was finally disposed of, to wit, July ninth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, he died of disease contracted as aforesaid, and the Commissioner then declined to proceed farther in the case, being of opinion that the death of the young man suspended farther proceedings; and whereas Charles D. Cox, father of said deceased soldier, is desirous of obtaining the pension justly due his said son from date of his discharge till death, to be applied to the purchase of a suitable monument to be placed at his grave: Therefore,

CHAP. CCCXXXV.—An Act for the Relief of the Grantees of Ann D. Durdning.

Whereas Ann D. Durdning, by her duly appointed attorney, attempted to locate the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty-one, in township ninety-seven north of range six west, in the district of lands subject to sale at Dubuque, Iowa, on the seventh day of November, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-one, with bounty-land warrant No. 23525, for forty acres, act of September twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and fifty, but by an error the location was made in township ninety-one north, instead of ninety-seven north, and a patent was issued on said location in township ninety-one north, which patent was destroyed by fire by the burning of the land office at Dubuque; and whereas the tract in township ninety-seven north has been withdrawn from market under the act of Congress approved May twelfth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, to aid in constructing the McGregor Western railroad, but has not been taken by or approved to that road at this time; and whereas the tract in township ninety-seven north has been several times changed, and the said Ann D. Durdning cannot now be found, and the loss of the tract of land to her grantees would result in a great hardship to them: Therefore,

No. 70.—A Resolution for the Restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the Active List from the Retired List.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Commander Aaron K. Hughes to the active list of the Navy, with the rank to which he may be entitled therein.

APPROVED, July 23, 1868.

No. 71.—Joint Resolution for the Relief of Peter M. Carmichael, Surveyor of the Port of Albany.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized, in auditing and adjusting the accounts of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany, to admit and allow the charge of one thousand and eight dollars, the same having been paid by him to John Hastings, deputy surveyor and inspector of said port.

APPROVED, July 23, 1868.

No. 85.—A Resolution to construe an Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Accounting Officers of the Treasury to settle the Accounts of Andrew S. Core."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core," shall be so construed as to authorize and direct the said accounting officers to settle and close the said accounts by crediting the said Core with the amount of such uncollectable, or unaccounted for, tax-lists or bills placed in his hands for collection as they may be satisfied have been lost or destroyed by reason of rebel raids, and have not been collected by him.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

No. 86.—A Resolution for the Relief of Jonathan S. Turner.

Whereas Jonathan S. Turner, of Fair Haven, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut, did obtain letters-patent of the United States of America, for improvement in alarm clocks, dated July thirteen, eighteen hundred and fifty-two; and whereas the said Jonathan S. Turner did, on or about the twenty-seventh day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, file in the Patent Office his petition or application for an extension of the term; in accordance with the provisions of the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July four, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and complied with all the requirements of the rules and laws applicable thereto, except the inadvertent omission of one revenue stamp of the value of five cents, for which omission only the acting Commissioner of Patents did, on the twelfth day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, refuse to extend the said patent: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Patents be, and he is hereby, authorized to extend the term of the said patent to the said Jonathan S. Turner, for the term of seven years from and after the thirteenth day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, which said patent, so extended, shall have the same validity, force, and effect, as though the extension had been allowed and certified by the said Commissioner of Patents, in accordance with the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July four, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, before the expiration of the original term named in said patent.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.

No. 87.—Joint Resolution for the Relief of Martha E. King.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Paymaster General of the United States Army be, and is hereby, directed to pay to Martha E. King, widow of Clinton King, late of the county of Carroll and State of Tennessee, deceased, a sum equal to the pay of a first lieutenant of cavalry from the fifteenth day of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, to the tenth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-four; and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of the said Martha E. King on the pension-roll, and she shall be entitled to the pension provided by law for the widow of a first lieutenant of cavalry who died in the military service of the United States of disease contracted while in such service and in the line of duty, since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one.

APPROVED, July 27, 1868.
